

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. Murdoch v.

Balderston.

Process—Reclaiming Note.—A cause, standing on summons and defences, was submitted to judicial reference; a record was made up before the referee; the Lord Ordinary afterwards gave judgment in terms of the referee's report; and a reclaiming note was presented, without any of the papers in the cause being appended—Held incompetent.

Proof—Insurance—Diligence.—In an action against the underwriters of a policy of insurance for loss sustained at sea on the goods insured, where the defence was, that the pursuers had misrepresented the class of the vessel, a record having been closed and an issue prepared,—Diligence at the instance of the defenders refused to recover correspondence between the pursuers and the shippers of the goods, posterior to the loss, and to the raising of the question between the parties.

THIS was an action on a policy of insurance at the instance of William Nov. 12, 1836.
and James Murdochs of Nova Scotia, against Balderston and others of 2D DIVISION.
Glasgow, underwriters, concluding for the loss sustained on certain Ld. Cockburn.

No. 2. goods insured, which were shipped by Morrison and Company of London on board a vessel subsequently wrecked off the harbour of Ostend.
 Nov. 12, 1836. The defence was, misrepresentation of the class of the vessel, which Earl of Moray was alleged to have been stated to be A 1., or first class, whereas it was Inglis. truly E 1., or second class.

A record having been closed and an issue prepared, whether the defenders were liable under the policy, the defenders moved for a diligence to recover correspondence relative to the insurance, between the pursuers and Morrison and Company, posterior to the loss and to the commencement of the dispute in question between the parties. The Lord Ordinary refused to grant a diligence to that effect, whereupon the defenders reclaimed, and contended that, as the objection of confidentiality was not applicable here, there was nothing to prevent them getting at letters or documents which might contain admissions as to the pursuers' knowledge of the class of the vessel, and which might be used as evidence at the trial. The pursuers answered, That the only question was as to the constitution of the contract, and that what passed after the completion of the contract was irrelevant.

The Court being of opinion that the only point was, whether there had been a representation by the insured that the vessel was of the first class, when it was not so in fact, held that correspondence taking place after the date of the loss, and the raising of the question between the parties, was not a proper subject for a diligence, and

ADHERED, with expenses.

No. 3. THE EARL OF MORAY, Objector.—Sol.-Gen. Cuninghame—Rutherford—Walker.

HENRY INGLIS (Common-Agent in Locality of South Leith), Respondent.—Robertson—Inglis.

Teinds—Valuation.—In a process of augmentation, a rental was given in, stating the lands of one of the heritors at a certain value, and the heritor held as confessed, upon which rental the augmentation was granted: Found that this rental did not necessarily form the rule according to which the heritor must be localled upon, but that he was entitled to have the true value of his lands ascertained in the process of locality.

Nov. 12, 1836. In the year 1832, an augmentation was granted to the minister of 2D DIVISION. South Leith, on which occasion a rental was given in, stating the lands
 A. Cockburn. of the Earl of Moray in that parish, under leases then subsisting, at Final Cause. £1590 per annum, and upon this valuation his lordship was held as confessed. In 1834, an interim scheme of locality was framed upon the rental produced in the process of augmentation. In adjusting a final scheme, the common-agent proposed that the Earl's lands should be localled on, according to the above valuation, making an allowance for a deduction of rent obtained by the principal tenant, during some years previous to 1832.

No. 3
Nov. 12,
Earl of M
v. Inglis.

The Earl of Moray objected, that he was not bound by the rental on which the augmentation proceeded, which was intended merely to give a general vidimus to the Court of the state of the parish, to be taken into consideration in awarding the augmentation; and his Lordship produced leases, dated in January 1833, whereby it appeared that his lands of Lochend, formerly let at £1500, were now let at a rent of £888, and his remaining lands in South Leith, formerly let at £90, were now let at £70.

In these circumstances he pleaded, that the rent actually due under the existing leases was the only rule according to which the final locality could be adjusted.

The common-agent in answer pleaded, inter alia, that as the decree of augmentation had proceeded on a rental, in which Lord Moray's lands were stated at the yearly value (under tacks then subsisting) of £1590, the final scheme of locality must be adjusted, with reference to his Lordship, on the footing of such rental, and that no tack of the lands entered into subsequently to the decree of augmentation could affect the present question.

The Lord Ordinary found, "That the valuation on which the Earl of Moray was held as confessed in the augmentation, does not necessarily form the rule according to which he must be localled upon in the locality, but that he is entitled to have the true value of his lands ascertained now: Repels the pleas of the common-agent, and appoints the cause to be enrolled, in order that the parties may state how they propose to proceed in following out this finding." *

The Common-agent having reclaimed,—

The Court were of opinion, that Lord Moray having been held as confessed in the process of augmentation was no reason why he should be held as confessed in the process of locality, and that there was nothing to prevent him now having a true valuation made of his lands.

THEIR LORDSHIPS accordingly adhered, inserting the words "in so far" before that part of the interlocutor beginning with "Repels the pleas," and found the Common-agent liable in expenses.

WALKER, RICHARDSON, and MELVILLE, W. S.—H. INGLIS, W. S.—Agents.

NOTE.—The best way of proceeding would be for Lord Moray to raise a valuation; if not, there should be a remit to some person of skill to say what is the value.

The petition was therefore superseded till a note should be lodged proposing a new nominee.*

By the late statute, 6 and 7 W. IV. c. 56, which was passed for amending the law relative to the process of cessio bonorum, it is enacted (§ 56) that it shall be competent for the Inner-House, during session, and for the Lord Ordinary on the Bills, during the vacation or the Christmas recess, on production of a copy of the Gazette, containing the statutory intimation as to the raising of the summons of cessio, &c., and of the statutory certificate as to transmission, through the post-office, of letters to all the creditors, or execution of citation against them, in cases where “the debtor is not in prison, to grant warrant for his personal protection against the execution of diligence, for such space of time as shall be proper; provided that, before any such warrant be issued, the debtor shall lodge with the clerk of Court a bond, with a sufficient cautioner, binding themselves that he shall attend all diets of Court whenever required, under such penalty as may be reasonable, and which, if forfeited, shall be divided among the creditors." No. 5.

Nov. 15, 1836
Sawers.

James Sawers, farmer, presented a petition to the Lord Ordinary on the Bills (Mackenzie), stating that one of his creditors (James Marshall) had given him a charge of horning on a bill of exchange; that another (William Russell) held a small-debt decree against him; and that, on 3d October, 1836, he had raised a process of cessio in the Court of Session, which had been duly intimated "by letters having been put into the post-office, addressed to each of the creditors specified in the summons, and also by the requisite notice having been published in the Edinburgh Gazette, in terms of the act 6 and 7 William IV. cap. 56, § 11, conform to copy of the Gazette, and a certificate of transmission of the said letters produced;" and that he was apprehensive of incarceration. He therefore prayed the Lord Ordinary "to grant him a personal protection from the diligence of his creditors aye and until the 1st day of December next, or for such period more or less as to his Lordship should seem proper."

The Lord Ordinary "appointed this application to be intimated on the walls of the Bill-Chamber and in the minute-book for eight days, as in the case of an application for protection under the bankrupt statute; as also to James Marshall and William Russell; and, in the mean time, ordained the petitioner to state what he alleged to be the amount of his debts and of his funds, according to the best of his knowledge."

A certificate being produced of due intimation in terms of this order, and a statement of affairs being also lodged as ordered, the petition was resumed on 28th October by the Lord Ordinary on the Bills (Corehouse), who pronounced this interlocutor:—"In respect it appears that the petitioner has instituted a process of cessio in the Court of Session, and made production of a copy of the Gazette containing the notice to his creditors, and of the certificate required by section 11 of the act founded on—Grants warrant for the petitioner's personal protection against the execution of diligence for any civil debt contracted prior to the 4th day of October current, the date of notice in the Gazette, and that until the third sederunt-day in November next; but appoints the petitioner, before said warrant shall be issued, to lodge with the clerk of Court a bond of caution, in terms of the fifteenth section of the said Act of Parliament: Farther, appoints this petition and deliverance to be printed and boxed to the Court on or before Tuesday the 15th of November next."

The petition was now laid before the Court, and no party appeared to oppose it.

Sawers.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I am not aware that any peculiar difficulty presents itself, in disposing of this petition. I think there may be many difficulties arising out of the new statute, but not under this application. It ought to be granted.

LORD MACKENZIE.—It can only be granted on caution being found by the petitioner to attend all diets of Court. And I am at a loss at present to see how the duty of fixing the amount of caution in each case can be devolved on the clerks.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The amount in this case, having been already fixed in reference to that period of the vacation which was still to run, after the interlocutor of Lord Corehouse, I think the same amount of caution should still be continued, as no reason is alleged for altering it.

LORDS BALGRAY and GILLIES concurred.

THE COURT granted the petition as craved.*

J. NAIRN, S.S.C.—Agent.

* In consequence of an application by the Sheriff of Edinburgh to Mr John Parker, assistant Clerk of Session, asking information respecting petitions which, under the statute above referred to, 6 and 7 W. IV. c. 56, might have been presented to the Lord Ordinary on the Bills, Mr Parker mentioned, inter alia, two other cases, besides that of Sawers, which were disposed of in vacation, and which were thus described by him :—

“ The first (Lord Meadowbank, Ordinary) was refused de plano, in respect that it was not stated with sufficient precision that there was a depending process of cessio, though the Gazette, a certificate, and a bond, all as mentioned in section 15, were produced.

“ The second, being for liberation and protection (Lord Mackenzie, Ordinary), was ordered to be intimated to the incarcerating creditor, with an allowance to answer in four days. Answers were lodged. They are not before me, but the substance of them was, 1st, That the Court had last session, on advising a condescence for the pursuer, with answers for the opposing creditors, granted diligence for the recovery of writings in proof of averments which, if established, would in law deprive the pursuer of the benefit of the process. 2d, It was broadly asserted that the pursuer's design in seeking liberation (he had been in jail for nearly twelve months) was to fly to America, whither he had once fled before. 3d, That the cautioner in a bond which he had lodged along with his petition, and which contained a penalty of £100 in case of forfeiture, was insufficient even for that sum—that the bankrupt's debts amounted to £1200, and therefore, in any circumstances, the amount of the penalty was inadequate. And, 4th, That the caution being de judicio sisti, the bond fell, like all other judicial bonds, to be prepared, and the sufficiency of the security to be judged of, by the clerks of Court in the usual way. The petition was refused, and the Lord Ordinary added the following to his interlocutor :—

“ ‘ Note.—The Lord Ordinary has some doubts of the competency of the present application under the Act of Parliament referred to. But, at any rate, holding that there is power in him, as Lord Ordinary on the Bills, to entertain this application, he thinks himself bound, in sound judicial discretion, under the circumstances of this case, to refuse the liberation prayed for. The Lord Ordinary may remark, that if the petitioner's health is suffering he has other remedies.’ ”

Mr Parker farther mentioned, that he understood the purpose of that part of the interlocutor of Lord Mackenzie, in the case of Sawers, which directed the lodging of a state of his debts and effects, “ was to enable those, whose duty it may be, to judge of the reasonableness of the caution to be received under the 15th section.”

 Of this scheme, however, a reduction was brought by the respondent, Teinds Buchanan of Ardoch, one of the heritors, who, in 1801, obtained decree Ld. Cock of reduction, and a remit to prepare a new locality, the locality reduced being in the mean while ordained “to stand as the rule of the minister’s payment, aye and until the pursuer furnish him with a new decree of locality.” No steps were taken to have a new scheme prepared, and another augmentation having been obtained in 1808, a scheme, embracing both augmentations, was approved as interim in 1818, and made final in 1829. In the mean while, down till 1818, the augmented stipend of 1793 had been paid under the reduced locality, which varied considerably from that of 1818 ultimately approved as final, so that an accounting became necessary between the over-paying and the under-paying heritors. A state of over-payments and under-payments was accordingly prepared by the clerk, who, in addition to the principal sums, charged the under-paying heritors with interest in favour of those who had paid beyond their proper shares. To this charge of interest Mrs M'Donald Buchanan and others, under-paying heritors, objected, contending that there was no authority for allowing interest in such cases, and that the ordinary principles of law which warranted the charging of interest could not apply, inasmuch as the payments were made under a scheme appointed by the Court, and there was neither blame nor mora on the part of the under-paying heritors, who could not know the amount underpaid by them, or whether they were due any thing at all, and so could not have the benefit even of consigning, open to debtors generally who desired to avoid liability for interest; while, on the other hand, the only over-paying heritor who insisted for interest was Buchanan of Ardoch, on whom the duty of providing a new locality was imposed by the interlocutor reducing that of 1799, but who had taken no steps to have that done. They further contended that the rate ought not to be higher than the current rate of interest at the time.

To this Buchanan of Ardoch answered, that he having advanced his own money for behoof of the objectors, was entitled to full indemnification, which he could only receive by getting interest, which he main-

No. 6. The Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—“ Finds that the objectors, under-payers in the accounting, are liable in interest upon their under-payments : That, in the circumstances of this case, and as the current rate of interest on loans has been variable since 1824, finds that the interest for 1825, and thereafter, should only be exigible at the rate of  $3\frac{1}{2}$  per cent, until a farther change in the current rates shall take place : Therefore, Repels the objections upon this point, subject to the above findings ; but finds no expenses due to either party as regards this discussion, and decerns.”

The objectors reclaimed on the general point of liability, and the respondent on the rate to be allowed ; but on the case being called, and the Court intimating a clear opinion on the liability for interest, the objectors withdrew their note on the respondent also withdrawing his.

ov. 15, 1836. ABOUT the year 1821, the late Mr John Buchan placed in the custody of the late Francis Wilson, W.S., two sealed packets containing jewels, stating them to be the property of Lord Strathmore, and delivered to him by his Lordship in pledge, in security of a debt.

2d DIVISION.
1. Moncreiff.
T.

In 1822, on the death of Mr Buchan, the claimant, Ewing, was confirmed executor-creditor of the deceased, though not specially to this subject. On the 20th August 1823, Wilson raised a summons of multiplepoinding, on the narrative of the packets having been placed in his hands by Buchan, and that certain creditors of Lord Strathmore and Ewing were disputing who had right to them. Lord Strathmore was called as common debtor, for his interest. On the 24th August 1824, Bridges, a creditor of Lord Strathmore, used arrestments in the hands of Wilson, and in November following lodged a claim in the multiplepoinding, claiming, as first arrester, to be preferred primo loco on the fund in medio, or, at least, that the packets and their contents should be sold under the authority of the Court, and the claimant be preferred upon so much of the proceeds of the sale as would satisfy his debt. No. 1

Thereafter Ewing, as executor-creditor, also put in a claim to be preferred primo loco, and to receive possession of the packets forming the fund in medio, or at least to be preferred upon the price of them, when they should be sold under the authority of the Court. Nov. 15, 1823. Bridges v. Ewing.

In support of his claim, Bridges pleaded his right to be preferred as first arrester, and that the jewels forming the fund in medio not having been confirmed by Ewing, the latter had no interest or right in them, qua executor-creditor.

Ewing answered that the possession of the jewels having been with Buchan, who had received them in pledge, he had a preferable right to retain the same in payment of any debt due to him by Lord Strathmore,<sup>1</sup> and that the claimant, as standing in the shoes of Buchan, was entitled to be preferred in terms of his claim.

The Lord Ordinary (Mackenzie) thereafter "sisted procedure, in order to allow the claimant, Mr Ewing, to add and eik to his inventory for confirmation of the subjects forming the fund in medio, or the alleged right of pledge thereon." This interlocutor was reclaimed against, whereupon the Court "sisted further procedure in this process, to allow Mr Ewing time to take the steps necessary for confirmation, varying in so far the terms of the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, without prejudice to the legal rights of all parties."

The cause having returned to the Outer-House, and Ewing having made certain additions to the inventory in the confirmation, specially with reference to the fund in medio, the Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor, adding the subjoined note:—" Finds that the * "NOTE.—It is not difficult to make an appearance of perplexity in such a case, but it appears to be really very simple.

"This multiplepounding was raised by Mr Wilson in 1823. It states, that the two packets in question were placed in his hands by Mr John Buchan, then deceased. This must be assumed as a fact in the case, nothing to the contrary being stated in the record. The summons further states, that Mr Buchan informed Mr Wilson that the packets contained jewels, the property of Lord Strathmore, but delivered in pledge to Mr Buchan, in security of a debt due to him. It is quite clear, therefore, that Mr Wilson's possession of the articles was a possession for Mr Buchan, and that Mr Ewing's claim upon them, as executor-creditor of Buchan, is precisely the same as if they had remained in the custody of Buchan himself. It is not averred in the record that Mr Wilson either got the articles from Lord Strathmore, or held possession of them for him. In short, there is nothing in the record to infer that Mr Wilson could honestly or legally have delivered them to Lord Strathmore, or any one in his right, without the consent of Mr Buchan, or those coming into his right.

"The summons containing the above statement, was raised on the 20th August 1823, and it contains the deliberate statement of Mr Wilson, who died

Mr Bridges did not use arrestment till 24th August 1824, and his claim

No. 7. claimant, William Ewing, has a sufficient title and interest, by his confirmation as executor-creditor, with the special eiks or additions made thereto, to insist in his present claim over the packets in question and their contents, forming the fund in medio, as the same were lawfully in the possession of the raiser of the multiplepoinding, as depository, for the behoof of the said John Buchan : Finds it sufficiently established by the decrees produced, so far as the matter is here in issue, that the said John Buchan was, at the time of his death, a creditor of the Earl of Strathmore to a very large amount : Finds that the claimant, David Bridges, found-was only lodged in the multiplepoinding on the 19th of November thereafter. Mr Ewing had been confirmed executor creditor of Mr Buchan in 1822, though not specially to this subject.

“ Under such circumstances, it might be matter of doubt whether the arrestment of Mr Bridges in the hands of Wilson was at all competent, seeing that Mr Wilson held the articles not for Lord Strathmore, but for Mr Buchan and his representatives. But at any rate, it could only be competent, on the assumption that Mr Wilson’s possession was the same as the original possession of Buchan.

“ In that state of the case, if Buchan had been alive, and Bridges had arrested in his hands, how would the question have stood in a forthcoming ? Buchan having possession of moveable articles, it might have been doubtful whether it could have been proved whether they were the property of Lord Strathmore, otherwise than by Buchan’s oath : and if he swore that they were Lord Strathmore’s property, but given to him in pledge for his debt, the Lord Ordinary is of opinion, that this quality must have been taken as intrinsic. But supposing the point to stand otherwise, and that it would have been competent to prove, that the articles were the property of Lord Strathmore, without any reference to oath ; the Lord Ordinary conceives it to be clear, that Mr Buchan would have had a right of retention of them in the security of his debt, without being put to prove any special pledge, unless Lord Strathmore, or his arresting creditor, could show that he obtained possession of them by some other title, or on some other footing than the pledge averred. The fact being established, that Buchan was a large creditor of Lord Strathmore, and the packets being deposited with him, sealed up with the seal of the sheriff, there would be the clearest presumption that he held them in security of his debt, unless some other title or ground of possession were shown. But no such thing is averred in this record. Mr Bridges will not admit (see article 4) that the packets were deposited with Mr Buchan in pledge. But he has put no special statement on record, contradictory of Mr Wilson’s statement in the summons, or of the facts there set forth, as averred by Mr Buchan.

“ The Lord Ordinary, therefore, thinks that the case is clear in favour of Mr Ewing, without the necessity of any farther enquiry. It would be in vain to allow Mr Bridges to prove that the articles were Lord Strathmore’s property, both because that fact is admitted, though under qualification, and because he admits, that he could lead no proof which would not land the articles in Mr Buchan’s possession, and so leave the question where it was. The only thing that could possibly throw any light on the case, would be an examination of Mr George Tait, the sheriff, as to the circumstances under which he put his seal to the packets. But as nothing is said on this subject in the record, the Lord Ordinary supposes that Mr Tait knows nothing of the matter, and that, perhaps, the seal was affixed without any reference to Mr Buchan at all. At any rate, the Lord Ordinary does not think that any investigation is necessary to the law or justice of the case. There is evidently no competition of diligence, Mr Ewing being in the position of arrestee, and Mr Bridges’ arrestment being not as creditor of Buchan but as creditor of a different person.”

ing on an arrestment used in the hands of the said Francis Wilson, long after this multiplepoinding was in Court, on the assumption that the packets and their contents were the property of the Earl of Strathmore, could only competently attach the same, supposing such diligence to be otherwise competent, subject to the right of pledge, lien, or retention vested in the said John Buchan, for satisfying the debt due to him by the said Earl of Strathmore: Therefore, prefers the said William Ewing in this competition, to the effect of his receiving payment of the debt due to himself by the said John Buchan, of which evidence is produced or may be produced: Repels the claim of the said David Bridges, in so far as it is made in competition with the said William Ewing, without prejudice to any question between the said David Bridges and any other creditor, or the next of kin of the said John Buchan: Decerns in the preference of the said William Ewing to the effect above expressed. But before further answer, appoints the boxes or packets in question to be opened at the sight of the agents of the parties, Mr George Tait, the sheriff-substitute of Mid-Lothian, whose seal is affixed thereto, and the Clerk of Court, and an inventory of the contents thereof to be made, and the same to be again deposited and secured, to await the further orders of the Court: Finds the claimant, David Bridges, liable in expenses to the claimant, William Ewing, and remits the account, when lodged, to the auditor to be taxed."

LORD MEDWYN.—I have no doubts in this case. In addition to the evidence of the character of Buchan's possession of the packets, which is furnished by the statement of the raiser of the multiplepoinding, there is the circumstance of Lord Strathmore, who was called in the action as common debtor, making no appearance, and that is conclusive.

D DIVISION.
F.

IN the year 1829, John Gilchrist, dyer in Glasgow, granted, “for certain onerous causes and considerations,” a disposition, ex facie absolute, in favour of the defender, Alexander Downie, merchant in Glasgow, and his assignees, of certain premises and machinery used as a dye-work. Downie was duly infeft. Of the same date with the disposition, he executed a back-bond in favour of Gilchrist, binding himself to hold the disposition in security “of the sum of £900 instantly advanced,” and also in security of the repayment of whatever sums of money he should disburse “in any way in relation to the premises.” The subjects were declared to be redeemable on payment of the advances made and to be made by Downie, and on the failure of Gilchrist to make such payment within a certain term, Downie was to have right to sell, and the price was to be applied, after liquidation of the expenses attending the sale, “in payment of the whole sums due to him as aforesaid.” This bond was never delivered.

At and subsequent to the date of the disposition, Alexander Downie was a partner of the firm of Alexander and John Downie, which carried on business in Glasgow. All the charges affecting the property disposed were paid by this firm, and advances and furnishings were made by them to Gilchrist for the purposes of his trade. In order to obtain repayment thereof, they sold the property, as in virtue of the powers conferred by the disposition to Alexander Downie, and proposed to apply the price accordingly.

Thereafter the pursuers James, Wood, and James, likewise creditors of Gilchrist, used arrestments in the hands of Alexander and John Downie, as a company and as individuals. They followed up this diligence by an action of forthcoming, against which it was maintained in defence, That the disposition and back-bond in question must be held to have been granted for the purpose of affording security to the company of Alexander and John Downie, for advances to be made by them to the common debtor, or at all events, that Alexander Downie was entitled to retain, in payment of the advances actually made by the company of which he was a partner, as well as by himself.

No. 8
Nov. 15, 1
James v.
Downie.

The pursuers, on the other hand, contended, inter alia, that the disposition taken in connexion with the back-bond conferred only a qualified right, and in favour of Alexander Downie alone, who was not entitled to retain or apply the price of the subjects conveyed, in liquidation of advances made or goods furnished to Gilchrist by the company of Alexander and John Downie; that the plea of compensation was excluded from the case, and the law laid down by the late Lord Meadowbank in Scott v. Hall and Bisset,<sup>1</sup> ought to rule the present question.

" The parties differ on some particular facts, and perhaps on some which, if cleared up, would leave no case; but the Lord Ordinary is in the belief, that the case may be determined on grounds independent of any of those disputed matters.

" The pursuers are creditors of Gilchrist. They arrest in the hands of Downie and Company, and also of Alexander Downie. Then the case is, that an absolute disposition was made by Gilchrist to Alexander Downie, under a back-bond, meant and admitted to cover advances by him before or after the date of the disposition. The back-bond was not delivered, for the Lord Ordinary is of opinion, that the pursuers fail in this point, there being no averment of delivery, actual or constructive, in the record. Still, there is a qualified admission that it was a trust for security of advances made or to be made.

" But, taking the right to be so qualified, the question remains, what advances it will cover.

" It was admitted in the debate, and there can be no doubt of it, that the trust will secure advances, whether made before or after the date of the deed. This is the known operation of such an absolute conveyance. The only question, therefore, is, Whether it will cover advances made by the company of A. Downie and Co., though the title is in A. Downie individually, he being a partner of that Company. The Lord Ordinary thinks, that on all the facts of the case, it must be held that the entire transaction was made for the Company, notwithstanding that for manifest reasons the feudal conveyance was taken to an individual, and he should be inclined so to decide upon the ascertained facts; but he must confess, that he is not able to enter into the relevancy of the pleas maintained by the pursuers. To him it is not at all apparent, as a matter of law and common sense, that the pursuers are entitled to seize or arrest the price of this property, supposing it to be strictly in the hands of Alexander Downie as an individual, even for his own behoof, in security of his advances, without paying to him the debt due to himself and his partners by the advances of his Company, to the common debtor Gilchrist. It seems to him that the whole argument for the pursuer, supposing the facts to be granted, proceeds on a fallacy, and on a misunderstanding of the cases of Smith and Bogle, Hall and Bisset, &c. Those cases rightly considered seem to the Lord Ordinary to prove the reverse of the pursuers' inference. Take Downie to be in possession, with a right of retention or compensation for any debt due to himself, on any sound reason be assigned why he should not retain for the debt due to a company of which he is a member, by advances made by them to Gilchrist at his price of the property sold, under the disposition to Alexander Downie, in liquidation of any advances made by them, whether the same were made by Alexander Downie, or by Alexander Downie and Company, to John Gilchrist, or on his account; but in respect that the parties are not agreed as to some of the particulars in the account founded on by the defenders, before farther answer, appoints the cause to be enrolled, and reserves the question of expenses."

LORD GLENLEE.—I think the interlocutor quite right. We have nothing to do with the heritable rights, as the subjects were sold, and the funds arrested. The pursuers have the very same claim on the funds as Gilchrist would have had. The defenders are undoubtedly bound by the terms of the back-bond, which says that the property shall be held in security of "all sums of expenses disbursed in relation to the premises." It does not require that the advances should be made by Alexander Downie's own hand. If in consequence of his order furnishings and money were advanced to Gilchrist, it makes no difference that they were advanced by a company for him. Gilchrist must have allowed for them, before he could have demanded back the subjects disposed, or the price.

LORD MEADOWBANK.—I am of the same opinion. I am satisfied on the whole facts of the case, that this was a transaction intended for the company.

LORD MEDWYN.—I agree. We are not going against the opinion of Lord Meadowbank, which has been referred to. I do not deny the general rule as given by Mr Bell; * but the rule is qualified, if there is "room for a presumed or tacit desire, for which debt, he might have to bring an action the next day? Yet this is the very worst case of the defenders. They have a separate case, in offering to prove by Gilchrist's oath, that it was really a trust for the Company, a thing perfectly consistent with the terms of the back-bond, or in requiring the pursuers to prove by Alexander Downie's oath what the trust was, or otherwise to take it as it is stated. The Lord Ordinary thinks that, at the least, the proof offered by Gilchrist's oath would be competent; but it does appear to him to be unnecessary. He thinks it clear otherwise, that there is a right of retention both in Alexander Downie, and in Alexander Downie and Company, for all the advances made on the faith of the security, whether by the individual or by the Company of which he was a partner. But he is apprehensive that he cannot pronounce a decree of absolver at present, because there are some special points urged as to which he is not sure that he sees clearly the effect of the pleas stated. The pursuers say, 1st, That certain goods furnished to the wife of Gilchrist, after he had left Scotland for a time, are not to be considered as furnished to him, and that, therefore, their value ought not to be reckoned against the price of the subjects disposed; and, 2dly, That the defenders unwarrantably took back some goods which they had furnished. The Lord Ordinary is not sure that he sees the bearing of this point clearly. His impression is, that as Gilchrist does not appear to have been notour bankrupt, the furnishings to his wife in his absence, for conducting the same business, must be taken as furnishings to him, and that nothing hindered the defenders to take back their own goods, though delivered, if they were not to be paid for. But lest he should be under any mistake, the argument having been directed chiefly to the general question, he leaves these points open. Probably expenses will be due."

* II. 666. "The general rule is, that in the common case, there is no concurrence

migation, by means of which a concourse may be brought about which did not originally exist." Suppose Gilchrist had brought an ordinary action for the price of the subjects, would Alexander Downie not have been entitled to set off the advances made by the company? On the whole I am satisfied that this transaction of the conveyance and back-bond was intended for behoof of the company.

Church—Ministers' Widows' Fund—Clergyman.—Held, as the sequel of the case reported ante, XIV. p. 509, that the minister of one of the Parliamentary Churches, who, in ignorance of his right to become a contributor to the Ministers' Widows' Fund, had allowed several years to elapse without claiming such right, was liable as a contributor, as at and from the date of his induction, and that, at the rate fixed by the statute for those who have not duly declared their selection of one of the rates prescribed by the statute; and that he was chargeable with interest on the arrears of such rate, all in terms of the statute.

SEQUEL of the case reported ante, XIV. 509, which see. On that Nov. 16, 1836 occasion the Court found, "that the pursuer is entitled to be admitted and received as a contributor to the Ministers' Widows' Fund; and appointed parties to lodge mutual minutes as to the rate which the pursuer shall be liable to, and the date from which such payment shall commence."

1st DIVISION.
Ld. Fullerton.

There are four rates of contribution, any one of which may be selected by a contributor; and by 19 Geo. III. c. 20, it was directed that every minister who shall thereafter be admitted to a benefice in the Church of Scotland "shall make his selection of one or other of the four above-mentioned yearly rates, to which he chooses to be subject, during his life, by a writing signed by him, addressed to the trustees hereinafter appointed, and which he shall deliver, or cause to be delivered, at the general collector or receiver's office (under a certain exception) at Edinburgh, on or before the 26th day of January that shall first happen after such minister shall have had right to his benefice for one half-year; and every minister, neglecting to give notice as aforesaid, shall be deemed and adjudged to have made his election of the annual rate," lowest

No. 9. but one, "and shall be liable for the said rate accordingly during his life." *

ov. 16, 1836.

orden v. The amount of the several rates was increased by 54 Geo. III. c. 169; but the obligation to make a selection, within a limited time, under the certification of being rated as a contributor at the lowest rate but one, was continued (§ 3) in the same terms as before.

rustees of 'ministers' 'Idows' Fund. In the questions under the interlocutor above quoted, the pursuer now pleaded, (1.) that his liability for rates should not commence sooner than the decree of the Court which found him entitled to become a contributor. Until that date, the defenders had refused to accept of any of the annual rates, even when tendered, and it would be unjust to subject him now in an accumulated sum of arrears. But at least his liability could not draw back beyond the Act of Assembly in 1833. He had not, previously, the whole privileges and status of a parish minister of the Church of Scotland; and the right, or liability of the Parliamentary ministers to become contributors, had never been imagined even by any of themselves, to exist, until after that act was passed. (2.) He ought still to have the selection of the rate, at which he should become a contributor. The obligation imposed by statute on those who did not make a choice of a rate, within a given time after their induction, should not be enforced against him, as he had not negligently omitted to make his selection, but was, without any fault, in a state of complete ignorance that he had a right to become a contributor, until after the period fixed by statute for voluntary selection had elapsed.

The defenders answered (1.) that it was fixed by the statutes on which the pursuer founded his action, and it was now, moreover, res judicata in this cause, that it was not merely on parish ministers, but on all ministers of the Church of Scotland, enjoying a permanent benefice, that the right, and the co-ordinate liability, to become contributors, had been laid. It was, therefore, from the date of induction into the benefice, just as in the case of any other minister-contributor, that the liability for rates commenced. It could not commence from the date of the decree in this action, as that decree merely found and declared what already were the legal rights of the pursuer, without bestowing any new right upon him. And it could not commence from the date of the Act of Assembly, as such act could not affect any civil or patrimonial interests, such as a right to this fund; and the pursuer had been inducted into his benefice, for years previously, and was recognised in the act itself as already an inducted minister of the Church of Scotland. (2.) The selection of the rate was no longer in the pursuer's power. His rights and liabilities, like those of the other contributors, were fixed by statute, and could not be affected by any pleas of equity or hardship. And the statute had fixed that where the choice of a rate was not duly intimated in writing, within a given period after induction, which period was long elapsed, the minister should be liable for the lowest rate but one.

Trustees of Ministers'

Widows' Fund

LORD BALGRAY.—The decision of this case has been attended with very great difficulty. I have seldom, if ever, experienced more difficulty, and I own that I have come to entertain considerable doubt as to the soundness of the judgment which the Court has already pronounced. But that judgment is final in this cause, and we cannot go back upon it. We must now carry it out; and, in doing so, if I were allowed to listen to considerations of equity or pleas of hardship, it might not perhaps be very difficult to give a decision which would do substantial justice to all parties. But the rights of parties, hinc inde, are fixed, on all hands, by statutes, and I have no discretionary power left. I must apply the enactments, and, in doing so, it appears to me that the period of the pursuer's induction is clearly pointed out by statute, as that at which his liability commences.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I am not free of hesitation in deciding as to the time when the pursuer's liability for rates is to be held to have commenced. I cannot allow myself to be influenced by pleas of mere hardship, but I am doubtful whether the pursuer could be viewed in all respects as a minister of the Church of Scotland, until the act of the General Assembly in 1833. He had no parish, and no Kirk-Session, prior to that time; and consequently no right to exercise ecclesiastical discipline. And as no authority, except that of the General Assembly of our Church, could have bestowed upon him the full status and office of minister, and as it did not do so without reserve or qualification prior to 1833, I doubt whether the liability of the pursuer to become a contributor, can be carried farther back than the date of that Act of Assembly.

LORD MACKENZIE.—In disposing of the concluding part of this cause, it is essential for the Court to keep in view that the judgment already pronounced in the earlier part of it, is the law of the case, and that we are bound to follow it out, so that our present decision shall not be inconsistent with what we have already done. There are two questions now remaining; first, the date from which the pursuer's liability commenced; and, second, the rate of contribution for which he is liable. In reference to the first question, I own if I could consider it doubtful, whether the pursuer was a minister of the Church of Scotland, prior to the Act of Assembly 1833, I should think it much more doubtful whether that act could make him a minister, in the sense of the statutes regulating the Widows' Fund, or so as to affect any civil interest. But I remain still of the opinion which I formerly delivered in this cause. I hold that this pursuer, and the class to which he belongs, were ministers of the Church of Scotland prior to the Act of Assembly. They had been regularly ordained and inducted by their Presbyteries; and, indeed, the Act of Assembly itself, in express terms recognises them to be "ministers already inducted or settled as ministers within the said districts," and it so describes them over and over again. But I never held that they were, in any sense, parish ministers, prior to that act. And if I had held that the Acts of Parliament limited the benefit of the Widows' Fund to parish ministers, I should have doubted very much

No. 9. whether the General Assembly had either the power, or the intention, to erect new parishes for them, so as to affect any civil or patrimonial interest whatever. Nov. 16, 1836. The General Assembly cannot multiply parishes so as to regulate civil interests thereby ; at least I am not at present prepared to hold any such view, and I conceive that their enactment was intended to refer to spiritual interests exclusively. Gordon v. Trustees of Ministers' Widows' Fund. But I think that the Act of Parliament gave this benefit of the Widows' Fund, not only to parish ministers, but to all the ministers of the Church of Scotland who were ordained and admitted to a permanent benefice in the church. And on that ground, I held that the pursuer possessed such a character and status, anterior to the Act of Assembly, as entitled him, under the Parliamentary statutes, to the benefit of the fund. Such right he possessed from his induction into the benefice ; and as the liability to contribute, is co-ordinate with the right to do so, I think his liability commenced at the date of his induction. It is true that the party was not aware of his right, or of his liability, for some years after both had come into existence. But although he had overlooked them, the Court cannot be affected by that circumstance, in duly enforcing both, when called on to do so as we now are.

In regard to the second point, which is the rate of contribution, it appears to me to be clear that the pursuer has now no choice remaining in the matter. If the liability commenced, with the date of induction, the limited period allowed by the statute for making a voluntary selection of a rate, is long gone past. As soon as it passed, the statute fixed the rate of contribution, in default of the voluntary selection, and that rate is the lowest on the scale but one.

LORD GILLIES.—In disposing of what remains of this case, I do not think the liability can be dated from the passing of the Act of Assembly ; I conceive that it must run from the pursuer's ordination to the pastoral office, and his induction. In regard to the rate for which he is liable, I think it must be the lowest rate but one, just as in the case of other ministers who fail to select a rate within the statutory period, and as to whom, therefore, the law takes its course and fixes the rate.

LORD PRÉSIDENT.—It appears, therefore, to be the opinion of the Court, that the pursuer is liable from the date of his induction, and that his rate of contribution is fixed by the statute to be the lowest but one.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor.—“ Find that the pursuer is liable as a contributor to the Ministers' Widows' Fund, as at and from the date of his induction, and at the rate fixed by the statute for those who have not duly declared their selection of one of the rates prescribed by statute ; and find that he is to be charged with interest on the arrears of such rate, in terms of the act.”

MAGISTRATES of GLASGOW, Compearers.—Ivory.

Burgh—Jurisdiction.—The magistrates of a royal burgh, besides their ordinary burgh-court, were in use to hold another weekly court for the decision of cases under 40s. in value, originally constituted by an Act of Council in 1772, and in which a summary form of procedure was established; after the passing of the Act of Sederunt in 1825, prescribing a certain form of process for the Scottish burgh-courts, this court was continued under the old regulations; in 1828, the magistrates by an Act of Council extended its jurisdiction to cases of £5 value;—Held, in a reduction of a decree in this court for a debt of £5, that it was incompetent.

THE city of Glasgow was by royal charter erected into a royal burgh, Nov. 16, 1836

As in other Scottish burghs, the Magistrates of Glasgow were in use to hold a weekly town or burgh court for the decision of all questions of debt in which the pleadings were in writing. In 1772, they passed an act of council “to shorten the present forms of the court in small causes not exceeding 20s. sterling.” A court was appointed to be held by any of the bailies each week, on Monday forenoon, for the decision of such causes, to be “summarily discussed.” In cases of intricacy, the bailies were either to take the cause to avizandum, or to remit it to the ordinary burgh court, held on Friday.

In 1796, the magistrates and council passed another act, extending the jurisdiction of this court to claims for debt not exceeding 40s. sterling, and empowered “any of the magistrates” to hear and determine such causes in the same summary manner. This court, which was held as formerly on Monday, continued to be kept up, receiving in 1820 a new set of regulations. Under the powers conferred by the 6 Geo. IV. c. 129, the Court of Session passed the Act of Sederunt of 12th November, 1825, prescribing a certain form of process in civil causes, to be observed in all the burgh courts throughout Scotland. This act provided that such courts “shall sit for the despatch of ordinary business at least one day in every week during the summer and winter sessions, such day to be fixed in each burgh by a regulation of court;” and it was declared that it should be “the duty of the magistrates to enforce in the strictest manner the said form of process, it being competent for them to suggest for the consideration of the Court of Session such other or farther regulations as may appear expedient.” The magistrates of Glasgow, under the authority of the Act, fixed Friday in each week as their ordinary court-day for business in all cases exceeding 40s. They still kept up, however, the Monday court for the determination of claims under 40s., not observing in it the form of procedure prescribed by the Act of Sederunt.

In February 1828, the magistrates, "as justices of the peace for the City of Glasgow and liberties thereof," passed an act of council, declaring that it should be "competent to bring before the ordinary small-debt court, held on Monday," all causes under £5 sterling; the process to be summary, in terms of the act 6 Geo. IV., c. 48, regulating the justice-of-peace court. This proceeding being complained of by the justices and their clerk as a usurpation, the magistrates, in March following, passed another act, whereby they "repeal the said act of court, so far as it is founded on the act 6 Geo. IV., c. 48; but in virtue of the jurisdiction vested in them by royal charter confirmed by Act of Parliament, and by immemorial usage and the common law of the land, hereby enact and ordain, that from and after the 7th day of April next it shall be competent to bring before the customary weekly small-debt court of the burgh, held on Monday, at eleven o'clock forenoon, all causes and complaints against persons amenable to the burgh courts, concerning the recovery of any debt, or the making effectual any demand, which debt or demand shall not exceed the value of £5 sterling, exclusive of costs; the procedure to be conducted in the same summary way as observed for the last fifty years with regard to causes not exceeding forty shillings in value, and the expenses of suit not to exceed the rates allowed by the general small debt act for Scotland." The proceedings in this court, after its jurisdiction was thus extended, were conducted according to the regulations in force previous to the passing of the Act of Sederunt of 1825.

Under these regulations, on the 23d August 1834, the pursuer David Mabon, amongst with the defender Montgomery, were cited, at the instance of the defender Walker, to appear before the magistrates on Monday the 25th, which was the small-debt court day. The claim was founded on a bill for £20, for payment of which arrestment had been used by Walker in the hands of Montgomery, and concluded for the sum of £5 sterling. The cause having been called on the 25th, was continued, and on the 1st September following, the magistrates pronounced a judgment, whereby certain rents claimed by the pursuer Agnes Mabon, as belonging to her in virtue of her father's settlement, exclusive of the jus mariti of her husband, David Mabon, were decided to belong to the husband, she not having been called as a party, nor heard for her interest.

Thereafter, Agnes and David Mabon raised an action in the Court of Session, against Walker and Montgomery, to reduce the magistrates' decree, on the ground, inter alia, of want of jurisdiction.

In defence against this reason of reduction it was maintained, that as David Mabon had not objected to the jurisdiction of the inferior court, or to the formality of the proceedings, he was personally barred from pursuing the reduction, and at all events that the magistrates had jurisdiction, and the proceedings were competent.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced an interlocutor in favour of the defendants, both on the point of jurisdiction and on the merits, adding, in regard to the jurisdiction, the subjoined observations in his note.*

Walker.

Agnes and David Mabon having reclaimed, the Court appointed the proceedings in the cause to be intimated to the Lord Advocate and the Magistrates of Glasgow. The magistrates made appearance and were cited in the process, and the Court thereafter ordered minutes of debate, "allowing the magistrates to give in a minute in support of the jurisdiction of the court referred to, if they shall see cause."

Minutes of debate were accordingly lodged, in which it was pleaded for the pursuers—

1. That the magistrates were not entitled, after the passing of the Act of Sederunt in 1825, to constitute or continue any court except under the provisions of that act; 2. That, even although they might have continued their small-debt court for the decision of claims under 40s., it was plainly incompetent for them, after the Act of Sederunt was passed, to extend its jurisdiction to cases amounting to £5, and to try cases above 40s., under regulations different from those prescribed by the act.

The magistrates, on the other hand, maintained, inter alia, that this was a question not so much of jurisdiction as of procedure, and it was a fundamental element in the constitution of the court in question, as of all others, that the court should have a power of regulation as to the forms and mode of procedure to be observed in the causes which came before it; that while the original regulations subsisted unchallenged, and the parties coming before the court acquiesced in the procedure under them, it was incompetent to subject a decree pronounced in conformity to these regulations to challenge, for the first time, in the shape of reduction; and consequently, as the magistrates confessedly had jurisdiction in cases amounting in value to £5, there was no principle for maintaining that they were to be prevented from applying to such cases the summary procedure they had been, before and since the passing of the Act of Sederunt, in the unchallenged use of applying to cases of 40s. value.

The cause was this day put out for advising.

* "The decree brought under reduction must be judged of according as the case stood at the time it was pronounced. Now, even if the pursuer had then raised his objections in point of form, the Lord Ordinary is not satisfied that they would have been well founded. But there is nothing on the face of the proceedings to show that these objections were brought forward, except in the present process; and it cannot be maintained that their having been so can be made the subject of a general proof. The very useful tribunal called the Burgh Small-Debt Court of Glasgow, is not a statutory small-debt court, strictly so called, and the full-written pleadings may be rejected from it: there is no reason for holding that no notice would be taken, in judgments repelling them, of such objections as those to jurisdiction, indistinctness of charge; and the very sentence in question, which does notice to the statement and pleas of parties, excludes the idea."

 Steele's Representatives.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I retain the strong doubts I formerly had, as to the magistrates' jurisdiction being well founded. Supposing we were to view the case as having been decided by the magistrates as justices of peace in their small-debt court, I am at a loss to know what right they had to extend their jurisdiction to cases of £5 value. They might as well extend it to cases of £500. Again, if we view the cause as having come before their magistrates' court, how could they proceed according to a form of process inconsistent with that prescribed by the Act of Sederunt? I think we cannot sustain their jurisdiction in either capacity.

LORD MEADOWBANK concurred.

LORD GLENLEE.—It is difficult to find any vestige of a title in the magistrates to extend their jurisdiction, as they have done, especially after the passing of the statute 6 Geo. IV., c. 120. I have great difficulty in thinking they could have such a right, unless by usage and the acquiescence of the lieges for a long time.

LORD MEDWYN.—I agree with Lord Glenlee, that without usage and acquiescence, the magistrates could have no such right. But it is merely as judges in their burgh court or court of conscience that they claim the jurisdiction in question. I do not think that the Act of Sederunt as to the burgh courts was intended to regulate such a court as this. So far as regards the court as originally established in 1672, I see no objection to the magistrates' jurisdiction, but I entertain doubts as to their power of raising the value to cases of £5. If sanctioned by usage, I should admit their right to do so. This is the ground on which I hesitate.

THE COURT altered the interlocutor and decerned in terms of the libel, finding expenses due by Walker and Montgomery, and also by the magistrates, since the date of the order for minutes.

THE late Andrew Steele, W.S. was in the habit of employing Bayne, a writer in Edinburgh, to conduct before the Court of Session actions in which his clients were concerned, and also processes in which he was personally interested. Of the latter description was a process in which Steele was engaged with Messrs Oliver and Boyd, in regard to which, as illustrative of the understanding on which Bayne charged in his accounts with Steele, the following expressions were used by Steele in three several letters addressed to Bayne in the years 1829, 1830, and 1831. “No cause that ever I had or knew of appeared to me so much without foundation, as that of the objections of Oliver and Boyd; and, therefore, I have confident hope, that both you and I will be ultimately fully paid for our trouble.” And again; “I have not the least doubt of success in this process. I cannot conceive the possibility of not proving my house to be my own, and that you and I will recover our outlays and for trouble." And again; "The two processes about Mathews' subjects in Dalkeith you may charge fully for all agent fee and every thing else; but in the process about the Cowgate-Port property, I expect you will only charge the outlay as formerly as in full, till the issue of it, which I hope will not be doubtful." In answer to this last, Bayne, on 17th October 1831, wrote as follows:—"I settle you with this the additional accounts which you want, viz. Oliver and Boyd's, Martin's and Mathews'.

Bayne v.
Steele's Representatives.

"I never intended to make any professional charges in these matters, and feel obliged to you for what you have already paid me in the last. Yours respectfully," &c.

The process with Oliver and Boyd was tried by jury, and a verdict returned in their favour. The Court granted a new trial, and thereafter the case was settled on a footing advantageous to Steele.

The sums disbursed by Bayne in this process were entered in his books, as were also the particular items for services and trouble; the charges for these items were not filled up. In his accounts rendered to Steele in 1830 and 1831, while the charges for trouble were left blank, the charges for outlay were filled up.

Mr Bayne having died in 1832, and Mr Steele in the following year, the widow and executrix of the former brought an action against the representatives of Steele for payment of certain business accounts, one of these being for conducting the process against Oliver and Boyd; which accounts were alleged to have been owing by Steele to Bayne at the time of his death, and in them charges were made both for professional trouble and outlay. While the other accounts pursued for were not disputed, it was pleaded in defence against the claim in regard to Oliver and Boyd's process, that Bayne was not entitled to claim, and the defenders were not liable for more than the outlay; that the expressions in the correspondence between the parties and the mode in which the charges for trouble and for outlay were entered in Bayne's books and accounts, were sufficient evidence of an understanding or agreement that Bayne was to conduct the process in question without making any charge against Steele except for outlay; and that this was a usual understanding among professional men in regard to cases in which they were personally concerned, the charges for services and trouble being made good against the opposite party, if the cause came to a successful termination.

In answer to this defence, Mrs Bayne contended that the evidence was insufficient to support the view of the defenders; that the understanding as to payment of outlays merely, only applied to the period antecedent to the issue of the cause, and not to the final settlement; but it was intended as a matter of favour to Steele not to claim from him the full charges, till it should be seen whether they could not be recovered in whole or in part by the party.

Nov. 16, 1836.
 Bayne v.
 Steele's Representatives.

* " It is not easy to gather from the correspondence and dealings of the parties, what was the precise nature of the bargain between them as to these processes, which the late Mr Bayne conducted for Mr Steele as a party. Three points, no doubt, seem clear enough. 1st, That in those cases, outlays only were to be charged (and occasionally paid) during the dependence, and prior to the issue of the cause. 2d, That if it issued in a decree in Mr Steele's favour, with an award of expenses against his adversary, the whole professional charges were to be made good to Mr Bayne: and 3d, That if it issued in a decree against Mr Steele, with (or probably even without) an award of expenses against him, Mr Bayne was to get no more than his actual outlay. But there is a fourth case (and the Lord Ordinary thinks it is in substance the case which occurs here), as to which it is not so easy to ascertain the true import of the agreement; and that is the case, where the ultimate decree was in Mr Steele's favour on the merits, but where he was not found entitled to his expenses. This is a middle case between the two last, and as it does not appear that any such had occurred and been settled during the joint lives of the parties, it cannot be said to be absolutely certain how they would have dealt with it. In dubio, however, the Lord Ordinary would proceed upon the principle, that professional services, rendered with ultimate benefit and success to the other party, should be fairly remunerated. The maxim is, that the labourer is worthy of his hire: and that it is not to be presumed that a man who lives by his profession, exercises it in any case gratuitously. If he is right, therefore, in holding that the case mentioned above as the third, is the only one in which it is clear that this claim for remuneration was renounced, it must be held as not renounced in that described as the fourth. And truly this seems no less equitable in principle, than presumable in point of fact. If, after a long and laborious litigation, an agent recovers a decree for his client for £10,000, though, from favourable circumstances in the defender's case, no expenses are given, it would seem to be most unfair not to allow him any remuneration for his great and successful exertions, merely because it might appear to have been arranged between him and the client, that, if unsuccessful, they were not to be remunerated. In short, where there is not a clear and explicit provision to the contrary, the Lord Ordinary would hold, that the condition upon which the agent's remuneration depended, was that of success, generally, in the litigation, rather than that of the client's obtaining decret for expenses, and being enabled to recover them from his opponent.

" The only real dispute is, as to Mr Bayne's professional charges for the litigation between Mr Steele and Boyd and Oliver: and the Lord Ordinary has said, that he thinks this equivalent to a case terminating in a decree in Mr Steele's favour, on the merits, but not finding him entitled to expenses; and the defenders did not seem to deny that it was so. The case was compromised, by the opposite party agreeing to purchase, at a fair price, the house which they had been contending they were entitled to have for nothing; and to let the litigation drop, each party paying his own expenses. The pursuer complains that this was arranged without consulting Mr Bayne's representatives; and says, that they might have refused to sanction it, and carried on the suit at their own hazard. The Lord Ordinary sees no reason to question that the arrangement was a wise and prudent one for all concerned; and has not the most distant idea, that either Mr Bayne or his representatives would have guaranteed Mr Steele against the risk of loss, and gone on with the action at their own peril. But, on the grounds already stated, he is of opinion, that it was an arrangement which did not deprive him of his right to remuneration. He cannot possibly construe the letter of 17th October 1831 (cited at page 4 of the Defences) into an absolute renunciation of all claims for such remuneration, as to the processes there mentioned, in whatever decree they might terminate. The defenders, indeed, do not pretend that it would have precluded such a claim, if they had been decided in Steele's favour, with expenses against the opposite party:

Steele's Representatives reclaimed.

The Court were at first divided, and ordered minutes of debate, and the cause was this day again put out for advising.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I have now come to think that the interlocutor should be altered. It is clear that in regard to this as well as other personal cases in which Bayne was employed by Steele, there was an understanding that only outlay was to be paid, and that, for remuneration for professional trouble, Bayne was to take his chance of success in those cases. Otherwise, to what effect could there have been an understanding or agreement? The whole correspondence is in conformity with this view.

payment of the composition effecting to the value of the annuity as at the date of the sequestration, estimated by him at £4293, 4s. 3d. It was not alleged that the value of the heritable security, or any sum which Fergusson had received from the estates of others of the obligants, would, with the dividend sought, satisfy the annuity; but Smith and his cautioners pleaded in defence—

1. The pursuer having lodged no claim in the sequestration cannot demand the composition agreed to on the faith of no such claim being to be made.

2. The value of the annuity should be calculated, not as at the date of the sequestration, but as at the period of settlement.

3. The pursuer is bound to deduct the value of the heritable security, and of the sums recovered from the estates of other obligants; and,

4. The calculation on which the value of the annuity, as concluded for, has been estimated, and which proceeds on the Northampton tables, is not accurate, as has been established by more recent investigations, and the value therefore ought to be ascertained according to the more accurate data for determining the duration of lives now ascertained.

The Lord Ordinary (20th November, 1835) remitted to Mr Cleghorn, accountant, to ascertain and report the value of the annuity as at the date of the sequestration, and also as at the date of his report. Mr Cleghorn accordingly returned a report calculating as follows the value of the annuity according to the Northampton, and also according to the Carlisle tables, at the three several rates of interest of three, four, and five per cent respectively, as at the date of the sequestration, as at the date of the report, on the supposition of all the lives being subsisting, and as at the same period, taking into view the fact that one of them had fallen in the course of the year 1835.

"It will be for the Lord Ordinary to decide which of these values at each of the two periods shall be considered best adapted to the circumstances of this case. The reporter may be allowed to add, that, taking four per cent as the rate of interest, he would be inclined to hold the fair value as at the date of the sequestration, and also as at the date of this report, to be the mean of the two before stated, or, at the first period, £4417, 19s. 6d., and at the second period, either £4247, 15s. 10d., or £3991, 9s. 8d., according as effect is not to be given, or as it is to be given, to the death of one of the nominees."

On considering this report, the Lord Ordinary (12th May, 1836) pronounced the following interlocutor, adding the subjoined note:—

* "The first point in the interlocutor is clear, and was substantially conceded by the defenders in the first debate, though it seems to have been the real ground on which they resisted a settlement out of Court.

"The Lord Ordinary thinks it also very clear that the annuity must be valued for a ranking, on the same footing as if a claim had been made at first, that is, that, from the date of the sequestration, on the one hand, the accruing annuities cease to run against the estate of the bankrupt, and, on the other, the entire value of the annuity must be estimated as it stood, on the facts of the case at that date. As long as it cannot be stated that the annuities are, or will be paid in full, this seems to be the only rule which the law can adopt. The failure of one of the lives on which the annuity depends, during this process, about eight years after the sequestration, cannot affect the legal principle of judgment. But, in truth, the difference in the result would not be very great, though the valuation were to be taken at the date of the report, because in that case the whole arrears of the annuity must be added to the sum brought out on the estimate of two lives only. But this just shows the inadmissibility of such a principle. It would be a ranking for a different debt from that which existed at the date of the sequestration.

"The Lord Ordinary further thinks it clear, that, in this ranking on the bankrupt estate of one of the joint obligants, the pursuer is not bound to deduct either the value of the securities which he holds from other obligants, or the payments he has received from their estates. Till he gets full payment on the full value, he is entitled to rank on each estate for his full debt, and the ranking here being for only one shilling in the pound, it is evident that it can go but a very little way towards effecting that result. The intromissions of the pursuer seem to be sufficiently explained for all the purposes of this cause, so as to render farther enquiry unnecessary.

"Which is in accordance with the mode of estimating the value of the annuity, the account-an estimate, both according to the Carlisle tables and according Ferguson v.

 Smith.

to the Northampton tables, and has recommended that a medium between them should be taken. Entertaining the greatest respect for this opinion, the Lord Ordinary, on full consideration, is inclined to think that there is no sound principle for striking such a medium, or for allowing the pursuer, in such a question, to claim upon a higher estimate of human life than that given by the Northampton tables. He comes to this conclusion for these reasons:—1. Though the Carlisle tables have been of late years adopted by very respectable societies, and may be held by many persons of high skill, perhaps justly, to be sufficiently accurate and safe for the purposes of insurance, the Northampton tables have been sanctioned by much longer and larger experience, and are still, he believes, acted on more extensively than any other tables. 2. By the act of Parliament, 36 Geo. III. c. 52, imposing the legacy duty, the Northampton tables are expressly recognised as the rule for estimating annuities, and, in fact, made part of the statute, the tables annexed to it being the same. In determining such a question judicially, the Lord Ordinary thinks that such a statutory recognition affords a safe guide. 3. The case must be treated as if the pursuer had claimed in the sequestration, in competition with other creditors, and the Lord Ordinary sees no ground on which, in such a competition, he could be allowed to strain the estimate to a speculative value of life, beyond that which is the most commonly and authoritatively received. The bargain was a severe enough one any way, for it will be seen that the valuation upon the three lives makes it, in fact, nearly, if not entirely, equal to a perpetuity. 4. If there were ground for going beyond the Northampton tables, the Lord Ordinary does not see that the matter could stop at the Carlisle tables. For the principle of the superior value of female lives has been already recognised in different quarters; and he believes that there are tables made on it embracing combined lives; at any rate, this would be only a matter of calculation, though intricate. 5. If he thought himself bound to adopt a higher estimate of life, he should think it very difficult in a court of law to limit the rate of discount to four per cent, or to avoid the legal rate of five per cent, and this, it will be observed, would make a much greater difference in reducing the valuation than the difference of tables would produce in raising it. Lastly, the pursuer himself, in his summons, asked only a composition on £4293, 4s. 8d., evidently calculated by the Northampton tables; and though, under the general words which follow, any mistake in the reckoning to a small extent may be legitimately corrected, the Lord Ordinary should doubt the justice, if not the competency, without very strong reasons, of materially extending the rule of calculation.

“ The Lord Ordinary thinks that, taking the Northampton tables, he may justly adopt the rate of four per cent discount, as recommended by the accountant, 1st, Because it is also the rule of the statute 36 Geo. III. c. 52; 2d, Because the ordinarily current rate of interest between 1827 and 1833 did never, he believes, if it were not in a single year, exceed that rate; and, 3d, Because it is consistent with justice at the present moment.

“ He thinks that the defenders rendered the action and the record necessary by pleas which have been repelled, and ought, therefore, to be so far liable in expenses. But the discussion afterwards appears to have been fair, and to a great extent necessary.”

securities held by him over the estates of other obligants in the said bond of annuity, seeing that it is not alleged, that, by so ranking, he will obtain more than the full amount of his debt in the annuity so valued, or even near to that amount: Finds that the value of the annuity, as reported by the accountant, according to the rules of the Northampton tables, and the estimate of discount, at the rate of four cent per annum, is, with reference to the most authoritative practice, and the conclusions of the summons in this action, the just valuation on which the pursuer is entitled to be so ranked: Approves thereof, and finds that the pursuer is entitled to be ranked, and to draw composition accordingly at the rate of one shilling in the pound on the sum of £4313, 4s. 8d.: Finds that he is not bound to make any deduction of the sums received by him from the estates of other obligants, since the date of the sequestration, in respect that it is not alleged that he has received full payment of the annuities, or that he will receive it by means of the ranking hereby allowed: Finds the pursuer entitled to the expense of raising the action, and bringing it into Court, and of making up the record, and remits the account, when lodged, to the auditor to be taxed, and finds no other expenses due to either party; and appoints the cause to be enrolled, in order that decree may be given for the sum of composition due, in terms of the above findings.”

Fergusson v.
Smith.

His Lordship thereafter (20th May) further pronounced as follows:—
“The Lord Ordinary, in terms of the findings in the interlocutor of 12th current, decerns against the defenders, jointly and severally, for the sum of £215, 13s. sterling, being a composition of 1s. per pound upon the sum of £4313, 4s. 8d. sterling, the value of the annuity libelled, as at the date of John Smith’s sequestration, with the legal interest of said composition from and since the 16th day of December, 1827, and in time coming till payment, in terms of the conclusions of the libel, and decerns: Of new, finds the pursuer entitled to the expenses of raising the action and bringing it into Court, and of making up the record, and remits the account, when lodged, to the auditor to tax and to report, and finds no other expenses due to either party.”

Smith, &c. reclaimed, confining themselves at the advising to the question, whether the value of the annuity should be taken as at the date of the sequestration or at that of the settlement, and to the matter of expenses.

Trust—Ostensible Ownership.—These were counter-actions, depending upon evidence, in which the Lord Ordinary pronounced an interlocutor in favour of John Hume, and the Court adhered. The principal question was, whether certain shares of the stock of a banking company belonged to John Hume or were held by him in trust for his brother, the late William Hume of Westbarns. His Lordship found it instructed by the evidence in process that the shares which were “subscribed and entered in the name of John Hume,” were in reality the property of William, and “that, although in respect of the public, and of the other partners of the company, the shares were never effectually transferred into the person of William Hume, in consequence of which John continued to be the ostensible holder thereof, and legally answerable to the public and the partners as such, yet in any question between John and William, or his representatives, it must be held that William was the actual partner or holder of the shares, entitled to all the profits thereof, and liable to relieve John of all the demands or losses to which he might be liable in respect of others as the holder of the said shares.”

Jury Cause.
R.

When this case, which was set down for trial in July last, was delayed on account of the non-attendance of a sufficient number of special jurors, the Court reserved the question of expenses.

The pursuers now moved for expenses, on the ground that the trial ought to have been proceeded with on the day appointed, and that they were entitled to have had a tales in terms of the 28th section of the 55

Geo. III. c. 42, which applied both to special and common jurors;<sup>1</sup> that on the view of this section not being applicable to special jurors, it would be necessary to adopt the improbable supposition that no provision had been made by the legislature for the contingency of special jurors not attending, when the very circumstance of the non-attendance of jurors was under their consideration. No. 14.

Milligan v.
M'Lachlan's

The defenders opposed the motion, and contended that the provision in question did not apply to special jurors, and that, the case having been set down to be tried by a special jury, the Court had no jurisdiction to try it by a jury not made up in the way provided by the statute for special juries. But if the matter stood thus, it was not the part of either the counsel or the agent of the defenders, who had applied for the special jury, to consent that the cause should be tried by a common jury or differently from the mode with reference to which the order for trial was given, and therefore the Court, having no power under the statute, and the defenders being perfectly entitled to stand upon their right to have a special jury, they ought not to be liable in expenses.

LORD MEADOWBANK.—In providing for the formation of special juries, the statute enacts that “the jury for trying the issue shall consist of such twelve of the said twenty as shall first appear.”<sup>2</sup> Now can the jury be made up of jurors of a description not contemplated by the statute? I should hold it incompetent for the Court to select a juror from the bystanders without the special consent of parties.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I am of the same opinion, and think no expenses should be allowed in this case. The clause providing for a tales may perhaps be intended to apply both to common and special jurors, but it is so obscurely worded that I concur in thinking that we must refuse effect to it in regard to special juries. I was led to order the trial to be delayed, considering that the Court had assigned a special jury for the trial of the cause, and that the party who had applied for the special jury demanded the delay.

LORDS GLENLEE and MEDWYN having concurred,

THE COURT refused the motion for expenses, and found the pursuers liable in the expenses of this discussion, subject to modification.

* The conduct of the juryman noticed ante. XIV. 1134, as having had a bottle of whisky with him in the room in which the jury were enclosed to deliberate on their verdict in the case of Shirreff v. Shirreff’s trustees, was this day enquired into. It appeared that he had been rather infirm in health, and had merely taken with him about 1½ glasses of whisky, in a small bottle, to be used medicinally for enabling him to sustain the fatigue of a protracted trial. In these circumstances, the LORD PRESIDENT shortly pointed out the great mischief which might ensue if jurymen were permitted to use spirituous liquors during their enclosure, and intimated that, in this case, the juryman ought to have stated his infirmity to the Court, who would have dispensed with his attendance at the trial. He was then discharged from the bar capital stock of the Royal Bank." Robert Jamieson died in 1808 and his wife shortly afterwards. His son, Robert Jamieson (2), and his sister, now Mrs Kinnear, had the stock transferred in the bank books into their names, as liferenters, in terms of the settlement. In 1814 Robert Jamieson (2), being in embarrassed circumstances, executed a general disposition in favour of William Scott Moncreiff, accountant, as trustee for his creditors: and by a supplementary conveyance he afterwards specially assigned his right in the bank stock. In June, 1822, the trustee brought to public sale Jamieson's whole liferent right in the stock, both in the half which he already enjoyed, and in the half to which he had an eventual right, on surviving his sister, Mrs Kinnear, who was a widow and had no children. Mrs Kinnear bought the whole right at a price of £1550, and, by her directions, Jamieson and his trustee, in July, 1822, executed a conveyance of it, which narrated the terms of the settlement of her father, Robert Jamieson (1), as to this bank stock, and the subsequent general and special supplementary conveyance by her brother, Robert Jamieson (2), to the trustee, and then conveyed Robert Jamieson's (2) whole right and interest, present or eventual, in the said stock, "to and in favour of the said Mrs Kinnear, and her assignees, and failing her by death, without having assigned or conveyed the premises, then to the said Robert Jamieson writer to the signet, during all the days of his life, from and after the death of the said Mrs Margaret Jamieson or Kinnear, in case of her death, without having executed any such assignation or conveyance; but always with and under the declarations and provisions hereinafter inserted, so far as regards the above destination in favour of the said Robert Jamieson." The deed also conveyed the whole dividends "due, or to become due, and payable from the said capital stock, during all the days of the said Robert Jamieson's life." Jamieson was empowered, "failing Mrs Kinnear by death, without having executed any assignation or conveyance of the premises," to have the liferent right transferred in his favour in the bank books. It was then "expressly provided and declared, that the said destination of the said liferent, and eventual liferent right of the said capital stock of the said Royal Bank, hereby conceived in favour of the said Robert Jamieson, in the event of his surviving the said Mrs Kinnear, his sister, without her having executed any conveyance thereof to the prejudice of such destination, shall be merely for his liferent use only, and strictly of an alimentary nature; and, accordingly, it is hereby expressly provided and declared, that it shall not be in the power of the said Robert Jamieson himself to sell, dispose of, burden, or affect with debt, his said liferent right and interest in the said Royal Bank stock hereby conveyed, neither shall his said liferent interest be in any manner arrestable or otherwise attachable by his creditors, or in any other way subjected to or liable for his debts, deeds, or engagements, and all deeds of conveyance, Thomson v.

Lyell

In this deed, the reason why a supplementary special conveyance in favour of the trustee had been resorted to by Robert Jamieson (2) was thus stated, after referring to the general conveyance: "but which conveyance of his said moveable estate, having been expressed in general terms, might not be sufficient to enable his said trustees to uplift the dividends due, and to become due, on said bank stock, and to sell and dispose of the said Robert Jamieson's liferent of the same: Therefore the said Robert Jamieson, in supplement of the foresaid general conveyance, contained in the trust-deed before mentioned, thereby assigned," &c. "all and whole his liferent right," &c.

In August following, Mrs Kinnear, who possessed considerable estate, besides the liferent of the bank stock, executed a trust-disposition and settlement, conveying to her brother, "but in trust, for behoof of the persons after-mentioned, all and sundry goods, gear, debts, and sums of money, heritable as well as moveable, presently belonging, or resting and owing to me by any person or persons, by bond, bill, decret, account, or otherways, together with all household furniture, and other moveables, of whatever kind or denomination, which shall belong to me at the time of my decease, with the whole rights and evidents which relate to the same, dispensing with the generality hereof, and declaring the same to be as valid and effectual as if every sum and subject belonging to me had been herein specially made over; but that in trust always, and for behoof of Catherine Lockhart, Jane, Robert, Margaret, Alexander, Christian Speid, and William Jamieson, children of the said Robert Jamieson, my nieces and nephews, and survivors of them per capita, equally among them, on their attaining the age of majority respectively." Jamieson was also named sole executor and universal legatory, but, in trust, for his children. The deed was written by a clerk in Jamieson's office, but the following holograph note was added on the back of the deed by Mrs Kinnear in reference to a name-child of No. 15.

 hers: "Declaring, however, the bills granted by Mr John Manderston, Nov. 18, 1836.
 for sums of money, marked upon the back, to be paid to Margaret Jamieson Thomson v.
 son Catanach, or her mother, are not to be affected by this deed, but are Lyell.
 to be paid by him, or to the parties, and in the manner which I have directed."

Mrs Kinnear died in the end of 1822, or beginning of 1823. Robert Jamieson (2) survived, and had the stock transferred into his own name in the bank books as liferenter in virtue of the deed executed by Scott Moncreiff. He uplifted the dividends on his own receipt. He had a family, but the ages of the members of the family did not appear on the record. None of them attempted to uplift any of the dividends during their father's life. He died on 7th December, 1832, at which time the Royal Bank (under a claim of retention which was afterwards extrajudicially arranged) were holders of the half yearly dividend on the stock standing in his name as liferenter, amounting to £229, 3s. 4d., which fell due on 7th July, 1831; and the dividend, of the same amount, which fell due on 5th January, 1832. A dividend of the same amount had also, previous to his death, been declared in the ordinary course of the bank management, to be due and payable on 5th January, 1833. Jamieson's children did not represent him. In these circumstances, a competition arose for these dividends, on the one hand, between the children and certain creditors, some of whom claimed for alimentary and pious debts; on the other, between the creditors themselves. The first question, which the children raised against all the creditors, was, whether the general settlement by their aunt, Mrs Kinnear, had not revoked the previous special provision in favour of their father, so that the whole dividends on the bank stock were conveyed to them, from the date of Mrs Kinnear's death, and could not be attached by any of the creditors of their father. A multiplicity of pleadings was raised, in name of the cashier of the Royal Bank, in which Miss Catherine Lockhart Jamieson, and the other children, pleaded, (1.) The conveyance by William Scott Moncreiff was the same as if it had been executed directly by Mrs Kinnear, being done of her own mere motion, and under her absolute control. It only conveyed conditionally, the liferent of the bank stock to Jamieson on her death, "without having assigned or conveyed the premises." But in a month afterwards she executed a general settlement, embracing her whole estate of every denomination, "dispensing with the generality hereof, and declaring the same to be as valid and effectual as if every sum and subject belonging to me had been herein specially made over." If the previous deed had not existed, this settlement must have been held to include the liferent of the bank stock, and every thing else of Mrs Kinnear's estate, but the specially excepted sum in the bills to Margaret Jamieson Catanach. But, it must equally be held to include the stock, and carry it to the notwithstanding the previous deed, because that deed was only

No. 15. to take effect if no conveyance or assignation of the bank stock was afterwards executed. The previous destination to their father was therefore evacuated by the subsequent settlement in their own favour. And their right ought not to be prejudiced, although he had got the stock transferred to his own name in the bank books, as he acted for them. (2.) The last dividend was not payable till 5th January, 1833, and as their father died in December preceding, it had never vested in him. The mere resolution of the bank directors, declaring the amount of the dividend, and the term when payable, had not the effect of vesting a right to such dividend, or at least making it available to creditors, where the debtor's right ceased prior to the term of payment.

Nov. 18, 1836.
Thomson v.
Lyell.

The creditors answered,—(1.) It was entirely a question of intention whether Mrs Kinnear's general settlement in favour of her brother's children, which was executed in August 1822, revoked the special conveyance for her brother's aliment, which she had made so recently as the preceding month. No change of circumstances had occurred in that short interval; and, in particular, the continuance of her regard for her brother was clearly evinced by her making him sole trustee and executor for behoof of his children, under that same general settlement which, they now contended, was meant to render him wholly destitute and dependent on them. This construction of the settlement was contrary to every presumption and every rational supposition; and the real evidence of the case, produced the conviction that Mrs Kinnear, in her general settlement, merely meant to dispose of her other estate, which was considerable, and had no reference to the previous special provision. In these circumstances, there was a series of precedents for holding that the special provision remained unrevoked.

The reference to the provision for Mrs Kinnear's name-child, Margaret Jamieson Catanach, had no effect in this question, because the provision on that child stood in very different circumstances from that in favour of her brother. Such a minute circumstance was more than counterbalanced by the opposite specialty, that, when Jamieson conveyed this same stock to the trustee for his creditors, a general conveyance had not been thought to reach it, and a special supplementary conveyance had been executed. The same view had probably been in his mind when the general settlement was executed by Mrs Kinnear, and the stock had been held not to be reached thereby, even if it could be supposed that the attention of the parties had been specially called to it at all. (2.) The dividend at the bank having been declared, in the ordinary course of procedure, the right to that dividend had vested, and the subject was therefore assignable or attachable.

The Lord Ordinary found, “ that the special destination of the life-rent of the Royal Bank stock in favour of the late Robert Jamieson, contained in the assignation of that life-rent taken by the late Mrs Kinnear, his sister, and declared in that deed to be alimentary in the person of Robert Jamieson, was not revoked by the general settlement executed a few weeks afterwards by the said Mrs Kinnear; and, therefore, in the competition between the creditors of the late Robert Jamieson and Miss Catherine Lockhart Jamieson, and his other children, repelled the claims of the said children, and decerned; and found them liable in expenses." Thomson v.

Lyell.

The children reclaimed.

LORD BALGRAY.—I think the Lord Ordinary has rightly disposed of the point now under review. I consider the deed by Mr Scott Moncreiff in precisely the same light as if it had been executed directly by Mrs Kinnear. She bought the subject and directed the seller how to convey it; and I have known entails executed by the seller of an estate, in terms of the directions given by the purchaser, which were, of course, the same in effect as if executed directly by the purchaser himself, after making up his titles. Viewing that as the deed of Mrs Kinnear, therefore, and admitting that there is an express power of alteration (which power, in the circumstances, would have been implied even though not expressed), I still think that the subsequent general settlement did not revoke the previous special provision. On looking to the terms of that provision, I see it is very anxiously declared to be an alimentary fund bestowed by the testatrix on her brother, which is to remain destined to him if she dies "without having executed any assignation or conveyance of the premises." This was the nature of the provision, and the diligence of creditors was carefully excluded. Now, when I see this lady, in July, so solicitously providing an alimentary fund for her brother's maintenance, how can I suppose that, in the very next month, and with no change of circumstances in the interval, she, by merely executing a general settlement in favour of her brother's children, which makes no reference to the previous alimentary provision to her brother, intended to deprive him of that provision, and bestow it on his children, along with the rest of her estate, which was considerable, leaving her brother totally destitute. I do not think that this was her intention—I cannot think so; and as this is a case to be determined according to the true intention of Mrs Kinnear in making her last settlement, I hold that she did not thereby revoke the alimentary provision on her brother. And I come to this conclusion with the less hesitation, when I observe that Mrs Kinnear makes her brother her sole trustee and executor in her general settlement. And it appears to me that the cases referred to by the creditors are much in point, and prove it to be well established in our law that a general settlement will not derogate from a previous special provision, where it satisfactorily appears that it was not the intention of the testator so to revoke it.

LORD MACKENZIE.—I admit that it is a principle in our law, that, in cases of strong and conclusive circumstances, a general settlement will not evacuate a previous special disposition; and the cases referred to as precedents were cases of that nature. But, in all those cases, the previous donation, mortis causa, contained no reservation, in gremio, as to the power of evacuating it by a subsequent conveyance. Such a power might no doubt, exist inherently from the nature of the deed, whether expressed or not; but in looking to the intention with which such a deed was made, I think it material to notice, that the destination to Robert Jamieson was, of a qualified nature, and contemplated from the first the possibility of evacuation by a posterior conveyance. Indeed the condition is repeated more than once, that the destination shall remain only if the grantor, Mrs Kinnear, died without executing "any assignation or conveyance of the premises;" or afterwards "any conveyance thereof to the prejudice of such destination." Considering that this is the nature of the first deed, the question comes to be whether the general settlement fairly included the same subject destined to Jamieson by the first deed, and revoked the destination in his favour, by assigning the subject away to others. No doubt has been stirred whether the words employed in the deed were sufficient to reach the bank stock, if they were intended to reach it; and perhaps there is no room for such a doubt. But the question which remains behind, is attended with much difficulty. In the whole circumstances, however, and in accordance with the doctrine of our law to which I have just adverted, I incline to adhere to the judgment of the Lord Ordinary. The circumstances of this case are very strong indeed. Mrs Kinnear evidently acquired the right to the bank stock for the very purpose of making an alimentary provision on her bankrupt brother, and from the first she took the conveyance of the stock in favour of her brother, failing herself, without otherwise destining it. Now, considering the settled and anxious purpose of making this an alimentary provision on him, and excluding all his creditors, I do not think that her execution of a general settlement, within a few weeks afterwards, which makes no reference to this special provision, and which confers no other provision on her brother, and which, at the same time evinces continued regard for him, by making him sole trust-dispensee and executor for his children, who are the parties favoured by that settlement, can be held to have revoked, or been intended to revoke, the previous alimentary provision, so anxiously settled on him. On the whole, I incline to adhere to the Lord Ordinary's judgment on this point, though I think it not unattended with difficulty.

No. 15.

Thomson v.
Lyell

LORD GILLIES.—I think it a case attended with very great doubts. But it is purely a question of intention, and on considering all the circumstances, and the strong real evidence of the facts of the case, I incline to hold that the general settlement was not intended to recall the previous special assignation by the testator in favour of her brother.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I am also for adhering. Every thing depends on the circumstances, and on the intention of the parties, so that there is scarcely any one of this class of cases which can be quoted as a precedent to another. But looking to the facts here, and to the anxious terms of the destination of the alimentary provision to the brother of the testatrix, I incline to think that it would have required a special assignation of the subject to other parties, to do away the effect of that provision; and that a mere general settlement ought not to be allowed that effect. In such cases as this, parties are sometimes apt to confound the question of power with the question of intention, which are very different things. The power of the testatrix was undoubted; but I think it was not her intention to revoke, and accordingly that, by a fair construction of her last will, we cannot hold her to have revoked the previous provision.

The Court then proceeded to dispose of the question as to the right to the third dividend.

LORD GILLIES.—In regard to the third dividend, I am clearly of opinion that the creditors of Robert Jamieson cannot reach it. He died some time before it became payable. It was true that prior to his death, the bank directors had fixed the amount of the dividend, and declared the period of its payment; but that was not enough if he died before it became payable. There is much analogy between this case and the right of a party to a term's rent falling due, under a written lease, to which he has a liferent right. If he dies, for example, between terms, the rent of the next term after his death cannot be taken by his creditors, and never became his, because he did not survive the period of payment; yet both the amount of it, and the period of its being payable, were as definitively fixed and ascertained, as the dividend could be by any declaration of the bank directors. Notwithstanding any declaration of a dividend, the bank might have met with such losses before the term of payment, as might have rendered it necessary to alter the resolution on the subject; or it might even have become bankrupt altogether.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I am of the same opinion. If the mere declaration of a dividend, as payable at a future period, was to suffice to entitle a party's creditors to attach it, though he died before it became payable, it is difficult to see what limit could be set to such a rule. If the declaration will reach forward to future dividends, not payable for a month after, so it might reach forward to the dividends of an ensuing year or years, if it only declared the amount and fixed the period of payment of them.

LORD MACKENZIE concurred.

LORD MACKENZIE.—This prevents the creditors from reaching the last of the three dividends accruing on this fund. But I am a little doubtful, considering the absolute exclusion of the right of all creditors, or their diligence, by Mrs Kinnear, whether the creditors (except those for alimentary and pious debts) can compete at all.

Pyper for Creditors. The children of Robert Jamieson do not represent their father, so that, as to any arrears of this alimentary fund, so far as it fell due to him in his lifetime, there is nobody to oppose them. The questions arising, therefore, fall necessarily to be discussed among the creditors themselves.

LORD MACKENZIE.—Perhaps it may be doubtful, even in these circumstances, whether such arrears should not go to the children, who have been all along undoubtedly in right of the fee of the fund, out of which these arrears grew; and whether such a destination of these arrears may not be truly according to the will of the testator and reached by it. Or perhaps they might be held to be just an unappropriated portion of the testator Mrs Kinnear's estate.

Keay for the Children.—I move the Court to reserve these pleas for discussion before the Lord Ordinary.

Rutherford for the Creditors.—No such plea has been put on record, or can be entertained under this record.

LORD MACKENZIE.—I believe these pleas should not be sent back to the Lord Ordinary. It would be contrary to the use and intention of our system of closed records to do so.

* Nothing was stated on the record respecting the rules or practice of the Royal Bank, in striking and paying dividends. The raiser (cashier of the Royal Bank) stated in his condescendence of the fund in medio, that the third of the dividends in question " was neither due nor payable on account of the stock, before Mr Jamieson's death." And it was averred by the creditors, in general terms, that that dividend " had been made and declared during the lifetime of Mr Jamieson, and before the 22d November, 1832, though payment was postponed." The children of Jamieson " denied " this statement : and the case was understood to be argued, in the Inner-House, on the general statement, as made in the prefixed report, that the amount of dividend, and the period of its payment, had been declared, in the ordinary course of the bank management. The reporters have been favoured by LORD BALGRAY, since the judgment of the Court, with the following note of his Lordship's opinion respecting the right to that dividend. " I entertain considerable doubts as to the view taken by Lord Gillies, in regard to the third dividend, and I am of opinion that the Act of Parliament ought to be first consulted. In banking establishments, the declaration and payment of dividends are regulated and specially pointed out, either by the Act of Parliament which creates the bank, or by the charter, or by the contract of co-partnery. The Scottish Act of Parliament, 5th Wm. III. 1695, erecting the Bank of Scotland, declares, ' That no dividend shall be made, save out of the interest or produce arising out of the joint stock, and by the consent of the adventurers, in a general meeting.' By constant practice in that establishment, and it is believed in all other similar establishments, the dividends have been half-yearly, mentioned to be ending at precise dates. And the directors who have the management, after the lapse of such half-yearly period, make a minute, recommending to the next general meeting of the proprietors that a dividend at so much per cent should be made. Then the subsequent general meeting express their consent by a regular minute, ' that a dividend be made out of the interest or product arising out of the joint stock for the half-year ending on a precise day, at a certain rate of interest on the capital stock ; ' and then there is a recommendation to the court of directors to fix the day of payment, and the same is advertised. Under these circumstances, if the act erecting the Royal Bank be conceived in similar terms, it is evident that the existence and constitution of the dividend commences with the Court of Directors, and is rendered complete by the resolution and declaration of the general meeting of proprietors. The dividend is declared for a period that is passed ; consequently, if the liferenters be alive after the declaration of the general meeting, he must have right to receive such dividend when it shall be payable. And if he dies before the dividend becomes payable, it must pass to his executor and not to the heir. On the same principle that any debt constituted but not payable till a future day, passes to the creditor's representatives, if the creditor die before that day, the dividend being constituted during the existence of the liferenter's right, is a debt due to the liferenter, although it is not payable till a future day. It therefore appears to me, that the Act of Parliament and practice of the bank should be more carefully looked into and examined."

Passive Titles—Executor—Creditor—General Charge.—Where the next of kin of a deceased resided partly within the kingdom and partly without, a creditor of the deceased raised letters of general charge, and a summons of constitution, which were signeted and executed on the same day, against those of the next of kin who were without the kingdom; after the lapse of 20 days, the charge and the summons were both executed on the same day against those within the kingdom; the summons was not called in Court until after the induciæ of the charge and of the summons had expired against all the next of kin.—Held that this form of procedure was regular, and objection repelled that the summons had been executed against part of the next of kin, before the charge had been given to the rest.

In the competition of creditors mentioned in the preceding report, Miss Catharine Christie, sister-in-law of the deceased Robert Jamieson, W.S., produced a claim as executrix-creditor, confirmed for £1403, 10s. and other sums. Her confirmation proceeded upon a decree dative following on a decree of constitution, dated Jan. 21, 1834. Part of the children of Jamieson were domiciled in England, and part, including the eldest son, in Scotland. The letters of general charge, and also the summons of constitution at Miss Christie's instance, were signeted on 13th November 1833. On 14th November, both were executed against those of the family who were domiciled in England. On 4th December following, being 20 days afterwards, the general charge and the summons of constitution were executed against those of the family who resided in Scotland. The summons was not called in Court until after the expiry of the charge, and of the induciæ of the summons as against all the defenders.

Lyell raised a reduction of the confirmation, and of the decree of constitution, on various grounds, one of which was that it was irregular to have executed the summons of constitution against any of the next of kin, before the general charge was executed against all of them. Though it had been held<sup>1</sup> that the execution of the general charge and the execution of the summons might proceed simul et semel, it still was essential that the general charge, as against all the defenders, the next of kin, should at least be concomitant with the execution of the summons of constitution against any of them.

The defender answered that by Macqueen's case it was fixed that the execution of the general charge and of the summons of constitution might proceed simul et semel; and had all the children been within the kingdom, it might have been irregular to execute the summons against any, until the general charge was given to all: but where part of the children lived in England, and the summons required a longer induciæ, it was regular to proceed by giving the charge, and executing the summons, unico contextu, against those out of the kingdom; and afterwards, giving the

Nov. 18, 1836.
Lyell v.
Christie.

The Lord Ordinary repelled this, among other reasons of reduction, and Lyell reclaimed.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I think that there was no irregularity in the form here adopted. Against all the children who resided in England the charge was given, and the summons was executed on the same day. At a subsequent period, the charge and the summons were both again executed on the same day against those of the family who resided in Scotland. There were thus two regular executions, in which not one of the next of kin had the summons executed against him, before the general charge was also given to him. They were concurrently executed in both instances, first against the next of kin without Scotland, and afterwards against those of the next of kin within it. But it is fixed that they may be executed simul et semel. Both the charge and the induciæ of the summons had fully expired as to all the next of kin, before the summons was called in Court. I therefore consider the procedure to be unobjectionable, and, in regard to this reason of reduction, I concur with the Lord Ordinary in repelling it.

LORD BALGRAY concurred.

LORD GILLIES also concurred, but was understood to do so with some difficulty.

LORD MACKENZIE.—I cannot concur with the Court in repelling this reason of reduction, which appears to me to be well founded. It is true that there has been a relaxation from more ancient forms so far, that both the charge may be given, and the summons may be executed unico contextu. But it has never yet been held that a summons can be executed without a charge against all the defenders being at least concomitant with it. The summons cannot be executed without a charge, or before any charge. Now if that be so, I am at a loss to understand how a charge against one part of the next of kin, which is not good against the rest, is better for legalizing a summons of constitution against any of the next of kin, than the total want of a charge altogether would be. By the style of the summons it bears, and necessarily bears, that the next of kin have been charged; and though I am aware that such charge may be concurrent with the execution of the summons, still it cannot be later than this. I therefore consider that the summons, having been raised against part of the next of kin, some weeks before the charge was given to the rest, was unwarrantable, and that the decree of constitution was irregularly obtained.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I should take the same view if, either, all the next of kin had been within Scotland, or all of them out of Scotland. But where part were within, and part without the kingdom, I think the case is different, and the procedure was regularly had.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Adhere to the interlocutor reclaimed against, in so far as it repels the reasons of reduction grounded on the objection to Miss Christie's decree of constitution as having proceeded on a general charge and summons irregularly executed; and before answer, quoad ultra," ordained certain farther discussion to take place.

In the year 1824, the respondent, Jean Carrick, purchased certain articles of furniture at a sale of her father's effects. She subsequently resided in family with her brother, Thomas Carrick, removing this furniture to the different houses successively occupied by him. About the beginning of 1833 Miss Carrick ceased to reside with her brother, who, on her leaving his house, refused to deliver up the furniture. On the 5th of February she presented a petition to the sheriff of Stirlingshire, praying that he would ordain Carrick to deliver up to her the furniture in question as her property. This petition led to a contested process in the Sheriff Court, the result of which was a finding by the sheriff, on the 29th November, that the furniture was the property of Miss Carrick, and a decerniture for its delivery in terms of the prayer of the petition.

ther, to a house belonging to the advocator Jaffray, to the occupation of which he entered by lease at Whitsunday 1833. Miss Carrick gave no intimation to Jaffray either then or afterwards that the furniture was her property, or that she was taking steps to recover it. On the 9th of December, Jaffray sequestrated for the rent the effects brought into his house by Carrick, and on the 18th December, on the narrative that Miss Carrick was about to remove the sequestrated furniture, presented a petition to the sheriff, praying to have her interdicted and discharged from carrying away all or any part thereof till payment should be made of the Martinmas rent and security found for that to become due. Interim interdict having been granted, Miss Carrick lodged answers, in which she set forth the Sheriff Court process in which she had been found to be proprietor of the furniture in dispute, and pleaded, inter alia, that, as it had been illegally detained and carried into Jaffray's premises without her approbation or consent, it was not subject to the landlord's hypothec. The sheriff pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds it instructed by the process between the defender and the compeerer (Thomas Carrick), produced, that the furniture in question is the defender's property: Finds it not averred by the pursuer, that the furniture claimed by the defender was carried into his house with the defender's consent or approbation, and that the process produced elides any presumption of collusion which might otherwise arise from the near relationship of the parties: Finds it instructed that the furniture in question was not lent to the compeerer for hire, therefore recalls the interim interdict, and assoilzies the defender from the conclusions of the complaint, and decerns: Finds her entitled to expenses of plea."

Jaffray brought an advocacy, and pleaded, inter alia, that there was no sufficient evidence of the furniture being Miss Carrick's property—that it must be held to have been deposited with the tenant, and allowed to remain with him, in which case, though not lent for hire, it fell under the hypothec, the landlord's right extending over all invecta et illata, and he being entitled to say that it was on the faith of the ostensible ownership of the furniture that he originally gave credit to the tenant;<sup>1</sup> that the relationship of Miss Carrick and the tenant raised a presumption of collusion; that in the present case she was bound to have intimated to the landlord the fact that the furniture belonged to her, and was barred personali exceptione from interfering with his right of hypothec.

Miss Carrick answered, that the furniture was proved to be her property by the sheriff's decree in the process with her brother, which process also showed that there was no collusion between the parties; that she was not required to intimate to the landlord that the furniture was hers, and was not presumed to know any thing about him; that even in the general case furniture lent without hire was not subject to the landlord's hypothec,<sup>1</sup> but in the present instance the furniture was detained from the true owner, and carried without her consent into the premises of the landlord, and was therefore entirely without the rule of the authorities referred to by the advocate, and, on the original principles applicable to this question, not subject, to the hypothec.<sup>2</sup>

* "The Lord Ordinary does not think it necessary for the decision of this cause, to go minutely into the decisions on the question whether goods lent to a tenant not on hire fall under the landlord's hypothec or not. He is inclined to think, that the rule, as laid down by Mr Bell, 2, p. 31, on the authority of the case of Cowan v. Perry, 31st January, 1804, is right; that, after all the explanations of that case which were given in the debate, it did distinctly involve the point, and that it is not really contradicted by Wilson v. Spankie, December 17, 1813, or any later case. But it appears to the Lord Ordinary, that the appeal made to the original principles of the subject does, when rightly applied to the facts of this case, very clearly resolve it, independent of that particular distinction. There can be no question, that, abstractedly and on general principles, the rule of law is, that a man cannot pledge property which is not his own: Res aliena pignori dari non potest. All the cases in which either express pledge or tacit hypothec is admitted, are exceptions from that rule, and proceed on a presumption of the consent of the real owner, by the possession voluntarily given, and the title of such possession as implying such consent. Hence, in the civil law, there is this rule in the Codex on the S. C. Velleianum, 'si sine voluntate tua, res tua a marito tuo pignori data sunt, non tenentur.' Cod. 4, 29, 5; where the exceptions of a consent given, or say thing done to deceive the creditor, are also stated. Both Voet, 20, 2, 5, and Pothier, 2, 277, § 241, as quoted in the debate, place the case of hypothec on invecta et illata, precisely on this footing, expressly requiring as the condition which creates the exception, that the goods placed in the premises, not being the tenant's property, are 'domini consensu in prædium conductum ita inducta, ut perpetuo ibi sint, seu in usum conductoris habeantur.'—'lorsque c'est de leur consentement, ou express ou tacite, qu'ils garnissent et occupent la maison;' and, though the latter author explains that the presumption of consent will not be effectually taken off, so as to bar the landlord's claim as upon fraud, by a latent agreement between the owner and the tenant that the goods shall not be subject to the hypothec, if, with the owner's consent, they are placed in the premises to remain permanently, he goes on in § 243, to lay it down clearly and expressly, that it is essential to the application of the hypothec, that it is with the consent of the owner that the goods are introduced into the house, 'il faut que ce soit par la volonté du propriétaire des dits meubles qu'ils soient été introduits dans la maison.'

"These are the principles on which the rule and the exception stand in our law. According to them it is settled, that furniture lent for hire is subject to the hypothec, on the presumption of consent by the voluntary placing of the furniture for permanent use on the premises. It has been thought that furniture merely lent gratuitously, and, of course, at the will of the lender, does not come within the same presumption; and, therefore, that in that case, the consent to the impignoration is not given, and the exception to the general rule not established, notwithstanding that the moveable subjects are introduced with the owner's consent. But this is not fully settled, and whether it stands on a solid distinction or not,

Jaffray v.
Carrick.

LORD GLENLEE.—I think the interlocutor right, and that we have nothing to do with the law as to furniture lent for or without hire. Here the respondent claimed certain articles of furniture, which she had originally purchased, on the

the fact which it is essential for the landlord to establish, in order to raise the presumption of consent at all or in either case, is, that they were introduced into the house with the owner's consent.

“What, then, is the present case upon the facts? On the 5th February, 1833, the respondent, not then residing with her brother, presented a petition to the sheriff, praying that he would decern and ordain Thomas Carrick to deliver up to her certain furniture specially described in an inventory, and which she averred to be her property. At that time the furniture was not in the premises of the advocator, but in another house at a very considerable distance, where it had been in use while the respondent herself lived there. Thomas Carrick's entry to the advocator's house was not till Whitsunday, 1833, three months thereafter. The petition led to a process in the Sheriff Court, in which it is quite clear that the respondent and her brother were at open war, so that there could be no collusion in the matter, besides, that the action was raised before the advocator could have any interest. The result of the process was, that on the 1st November, 1833, the sheriff found it proved that the furniture was the property of the respondent, and decerned for delivery, in terms of the prayer of the petition. By that time the furniture was in the advocator's house, but no sequestration was applied for till some time after the date of the decree.

“In this state of the case, the question is, whether the advocator has any legal basis on which to establish the exception from the general rule of law, that the property of a third party cannot be pledged or hypothecated. The decree of the sheriff must be taken as establishing that the goods are the property of the respondent, unless the advocator had offered, in some competent form, to prove that it did not belong to her either for herself, or in trust for others. And, taking it to be the respondent's property, it is for the advocator to show, either as matter of fact, or by some admissible presumption of law, that she consented to their being introduced into his house. As matter of fact, this is impossible, because three months before the brother's entry to the advocator's house, while confessedly the furniture was in a different place, she had judicially demanded decree for delivery of it to herself. But the Lord Ordinary apprehends that there can be no presumption of law in this matter. The consent to the introduction of the goods, which the authorities speak of as essential to ground the presumption of consent to the hypothecation, must be an actual consent; whereas here it was in the face of a judicial demand of delivery, that they were moved into the advocator's premises. The advocator says, that the goods are ostensibly in the possession of Thomas, and that he had no notice of the respondent's right or of the respondent's process. But this assumes that she was bound to give any such notice. She might know nothing of the intention to remove this furniture. A possession held by Thomas in one house, from the accident of the parties having previously lived together, could not warrant any party to infer a consent to his hypothecating them to another party and in a different house. Yet it lies with the advocator, who says that a consent was given, to show that it was so; and whether the litigiousness by the process might of itself create an impediment to the constitution of such a hypothec or not, it at least brings the case to this, that the advocator can never show that either by actual consent, or by any presumed consent of the respondent, the furniture was removed into his premises.

“The Lord Ordinary, therefore, thinks that on this ground the case is clear in favour of the respondent. The sheriff has found the fact instructed that the furniture was not lent for hire. But his judgment stands firm on the other ground, comprised in the two first findings of the interlocutor.”

plea that they were not lent but taken away tortiously, and she was successful in vindicating them. It seems unreasonable to suppose that she was bound in initio litis to warn the whole world against trusting her brother. She raised the process in February before the term of his entry to the advocator's premises; and how she was to know that her brother was to take the advocator's house, I cannot see. Intimation subsequent to that was unnecessary, and the advocator admits in his pleadings that at the date of the sequestration, he knew she was claiming the furniture. I see no evidence that the furniture was left with the respondent's brother, when she separated from him, by her consent, but the contrary; and I am therefore for adhering.

No. 18.

Nov. 18, 1836
Jaffray v.
Carrick.

LORD MEADOWBANK.—I am of the same opinion. This furniture was the property of the respondent, and tortiously withheld from her. Supposing her brother, instead of detaining the furniture in his possession, had broken into her house and stolen or spoliated it, was she to be precluded from reclaiming her property, though no notice had been given to the landlord? To say so would be the wildest proposition ever advanced. If the advocator relied solely on the property appearing in the possession of the tenant, was he not bound to ascertain if the furniture really was Thomas Carrick's property? The principle on which the effects of a third party are made liable to the landlord's hypothec is, that they have come into the tenant's possession with the express or implied consent of the owner; but how implied consent is to be made out from express dissent it would be difficult to discover.

LORD MEDWYN.—I take a somewhat different view. As to the case that was put of the property being stolen, there a labes realis attaches, which always entitles the owner to vindicate. My difficulty is, that the respondent, having got decree in the process with her brother in November, gave no intimation to the landlord, who did not sequester till the 9th of December. It is the principle of the law of hypothec that the invecta et illata are hypothecated to the landlord, and whoever leaves furniture to be made use of must know that it is liable for the rent. When the respondent brought the process to recover her furniture, she ought to have put Mr Jaffray on his guard, and intimated that she did not consent to the furniture being removed to his premises. In such a case, the circumstance, "nec admonuit locatorem," is regarded as essential by Voet.*

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—It is not necessary for us to decide any general point. I go on the specialties of the case, which are here clearly made out. The respondent commenced proceedings to vindicate her property in February; the tenant's entry took place at Whitsunday following. It is said, why did she not interpellate when the furniture was removing into the advocator's house; but I see no necessity for such a proceeding. Besides, by claiming her property in the Sheriff Court, she gave sufficient warning. Having given no consent to its detention by her brother and subsequent removal, there was nothing to prevent her vindicating it. Take the case of spulzied property. While the owner is taking steps to recover, would a landlord be entitled to make the subjects liable for rent?

T.

THE judgment in this case (ante, XIV. p. 313) having been affirmed on appeal (August 16 and 19, 1836), the Court, on the application of the Marquis and Marchioness of Chandos (November 12) applied the judgments of the House of Lords, and decerned and ordained the trustees of the late Marquis to make over to the petitioners "one-third part of the free moveable estate of the deceased," to which they had been found entitled in name of legitim.

Thereafter, Lord and Lady Chandos presented a petition, setting forth, that the amount of the moveable succession, as condescended on in the multiplepoinding, was £325,666, 17s. 10d.; that the Dowager Marchioness of Breadalbane had already received, in respect of her jus relictæ, an interim decree for £100,000; that the trustees were willing to have made a similar payment to the petitioners, but had been interpellated from doing so by the Marquis of Breadalbane, on the ground of the dependence of certain proceedings in the Court of Chancery, instituted by his Lordship with the view of "reforming" the existing marriage-contract between the petitioners; that, with reference to these proceedings, while the judgment of this Court was under appeal, his Lordship had petitioned the House of Lords to put off the hearing “until judgment should be pronounced in the suit before the Court of Chancery,” stating, in his petition, that he had been “advised, that if the judgment of the said Court of Session shall be affirmed by your Lordships, the same will be conclusive against your petitioner, although the said provisions in the said settlement should be declared to have been in full satisfaction of the right of the said Marchioness of Chandos to legitim, and although the said settlement should be decreed to be amended and reformed in manner aforesaid;” that the House of Lords had refused this application, and proceeded to hear and dispose of the appeal; and that the dependence of the Chancery proceedings was no ground whatever for preventing the judgment of the House of Lords from receiving present effect. They therefore prayed to be found entitled to an interim payment to the extent of £100,000.

Breadalbane.

The Marquis of Breadalbane put in answers to this petition, in which he contended, that the amount of the finding of the Court in regard to his claim of legitim was, that he must collate his interest in the entailed estate before he could make an effectual claim thereto, and that time ought to be allowed him for consideration, and a period assigned, within which he may be enabled to declare his option to collate or not; that having recently discovered important documents not under consideration of the Court of Session, showing that the marriage-contract in question was disconform to the intention of the parties, he had filed a bill in the Court of Chancery, praying that Court to correct or reform the contract, by having a clause inserted excluding Lady Chandos's claim of legitim, and to grant an injunction against Lord and Lady Chandos receiving, and the trustees paying over to them, any part of the funds in dispute; that he was in daily expectation of such injunction being granted, and the Court ought to stay their proceedings until the injunction should be allowed or refused.

The trustees likewise lodged answers, stating, that they were willing to consent to an interim decree to the extent of £70,000, provided the Court should put them in safety to do so.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—Looking to the very deliberate manner in which this question has been decided, to the nature of Lady Chandos's claim, and the way in which it was opposed by Lord Breadalbane, and also to the way in which he enforced his own claim, and looking to his Lordship's petition to the House of Lords to delay the hearing of his own appeal, and the statement then made by him, I am of opinion that the delay which is now asked ought not to be granted. If a case was deliberately considered, and the interests of parties carefully weighed, it was in the present instance. It is too much for the Marquis now to require time to deliberate whether he will or will not collate. He has had time to do so. No doubt, even at this hour, he is entitled, on the principle of justice, to come forward and say, I am ready to collate; but that cannot warrant this demand for the application of the judgment being delayed. The other ground alleged for delay is, the dependence of certain proceedings in Chancery relative to Lord and Lady Chandos's marriage-contract. But this is no new discovery, as the same ground was urged before the House of Lords. An able argument was maintained on the interpretation of that contract, and we were of opinion that Lady Chandos was entitled to her legitim, it not being formally excluded. The argument for Lord Breadalbane was pressed in the House of Lords, but their Lordships affirmed our judgment. In reference to this proposal of Lord Breadalbane, I would ask, who is so competent to judge of the effect to be allowed to these proceedings in the Court of Chancery as the House of Lords, to whom the petition founding on them was presented? After hearing that petition, they disposed of the appeal, affirming our judgment. On the whole, I am decidedly of opinion that nothing has been stated to make us delay judgment on this application for an interim decree, and I think it should be for £70,000.

LORD GLENLEE.—I do not see how, consistently with our duty, we could do otherwise than has been proposed. The judgment of this Court has been affirmed; and we do not require any consent from the trustees, as they must obey. As to granting Lord Breadalbane time to consider if he will collate or not, I never heard of such a proposal.

LORD MEADOWBANK.—It is unnecessary for the rest of the Court to do more than express their concurrence in the opinions given by the Chair and Lord Glenlee. I think we should act most irregularly were we not to grant the interim decree.

LORD MEDWYN.—I entirely concur. According to the terms of our judgment, I have no doubt that Lord Breadalbane may now offer to collate, but he is not entitled to require an order from the Court of Session for him to say whether he will or will not collate. As to the proceedings in the Court of Chancery, we know nothing of them or their effects. They have been compared to a process of reduction on the ground of res noviter veniens. I doubt much whether this would be a sufficient cause for our allowing delay; and it would be matter of grave consideration how far we are not bound to carry through directly the judgment of the House of Lords. If the proceedings in Chancery should be such as to affect that judgment, the trustees are well advised, and will judge how far they are bound by them; but there is no collision of jurisdictions, as we have merely to follow out the judgment of the House of Lords, and have no concern with the proceedings of any other Court.

THE COURT accordingly granted interim decree for £70,000, to be paid by the trustees to the petitioners.*

Maclaren v.

Process—Suspension.—Bill of suspension refused as informal, there being no Symers' conclusion for suspension of the charge.

In June, 1836, the respondent, Symers, took out a small-debt summons for £8, 15s. in the Sheriff Court of Glasgow against the suspender, Maclaren. The principal summons bore to be for "the sum of £8, 15s., per account contracted prior to 9th September last." The citation-copy omitted to mention the sum being due "per account," but, in the will, the messenger was required "to deliver to the defender a copy of any account pursued for." A copy of the account pursued for was served along with the complaint; and it was so stated in the execution by the officer.

The Sheriff having decerned for the sum claimed, Maclaren presented a bill of suspension, on the ground of the provisions of 10 Geo. IV. c. 55, having been contravened, in so far as no mention of the sum in question being due "per account" was made in the body of the claim served on the defender.<sup>1</sup> The suspender, on presenting the bill, did not produce the citation therein referred to as defective.

Answers having been given in, the Lord Ordinary (Jeffrey) pronounced the following interlocutor, refusing the bill, and added the subjoined note:—"In respect that the principal summons (which is not sought to be reduced or improved) distinctly specifies the debt to be due by an account rendered, that the execution thereon bears that a copy of such account was served on the suspender, that it is admitted that such a copy was actually served along with the citation, and that the suspender has not produced the citation so served on him, to instruct his averment that "If the copy of citation makes no mention of the account, the case would be within the rule of that of Wallace. But while this is withheld, no credit whatever is due to the mere averment of the suspender, in opposition to the original summons and execution thereon, produced. The objection founded on the want of specification as to the bill, which forms one item in the account, is a great deal too critical. First, It is quite competent and usual to describe generally as due per account, though one item in the account may be a bill, or the balance of a bill; and, second, If the debt had been only described in the summons as due per bill, this would have been quite sufficient, provided a bill was produced and served, and noticed as served in the execution and citation. That it was not a bill due originally to the pursuer, but one to which he had afterwards acquired right, could be of no consequence as to the form or sufficiency of the procedure, ~~and~~ it might suggest upon the merits."

Maclaren v.
Symers.

The suspender thereafter presented a note to the Lord Ordinary, setting forth, that the citation-copy of the claim had been improperly withheld by the respondent, and craving his Lordship to rescind the interlocutor, or, at all events, prohibit the clerk from issuing any certificate of the refusal of the bill, for such time as would enable him to bring the interlocutor under review.

His Lordship (24th September) "refused, as incompetent, the prayer of this note, to cancel a recorded interlocutor; but prohibited the clerk from issuing a certificate of refusal for eight days from this date," issuing at the same time the note subjoined.*

Maclaren then presented a second bill of suspension, which, after the narrative and argument, concluded thus:—

"For these and other reasons to be proponed at discussing hereof, the complainer has no doubt that your Lordships will have no difficulty in granting him letters of suspension in the premises, without caution or consignation, as was done in the cases before referred to.

"Herefore the complainer beseeches your Lordships to recal the interlocutor refusing the first bill of suspension, and to grant him letters of suspension in the premises without caution or consignation.

"According to Justice, &c."

Symers, in his answers, contended, inter alia, that the bill was irregular and inoperative, as containing no conclusion that the charge should be suspended.<sup>1</sup>

* "The Lord Ordinary must not be understood as entirely acquiescing in the suspender's view of the effect of the omission in the copy of citation, the case differing from that of Wallace in this material circumstance, that not only is there a copy of the account actually served, but that in the will of the summons recited in that citation, there is an express order to serve or deliver such a copy. The Lord Ordinary understands that there was no such recital in Wallace's case; but still it now appears to come so near it that he thinks the suspender fully entitled to the means of presenting a second bill, and only regrets that a proceeding which now appears to be imputable to the other party should have made such a step necessary."

The Lord Ordinary (Meadowbank) refused the bill, with expenses. No. 20.

Maclaren reclaimed, and, on the point of the informality of the bill, contended, that its style was conform to the present practice of drawing bills of suspension, and that an objection similar to the present had been repelled in the case of letters of advocacy.<sup>1</sup>

Nov. 19, 1836.
Maclaren v.
Symers.

Symers answered, that the present bill was not according to the form in the style-book; and that the case referred to showed the necessity of a conclusion for suspension, their Lordships having in that case merely found that the defect in the letters was in some measure supplied by the will bearing a warrant for advocacy.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I do not think, in this case, we should be warranted in departing from the style-book. I am not satisfied that this bill has been prepared in the proper form, and I am for refusing the note.

LORD MEDWYN.—I agree. There is no reason for departing from the regular style. Here there is no conclusion for suspension; and if we want what we should have in these proceedings, we have what we should not have had—a reclaiming note to the Lord Ordinary on the Bills to recal his interlocutor.

LORD GLENLEE.—I concur; but the distinction is very thin between the form in the style-book and that of the present bill.

THE COURT accordingly refused the note.

the bill, there is substituted the will or command to the messenger to cite the charger, that he may see the charge suspended. In the present case there is no conclusion in the bill of suspension that the charge should be suspended. There is only a prayer for letters of suspension, which prayer was granted. In like manner the expedite letters contain no conclusion for suspension, and that defect is not supplied by the command to the messenger to cite the charger to the action. It is a defect also which cannot be remedied as in the case of an ordinary summons."

Outlawry — Horning — Entail — Jurisdiction — Trust. — Criminal letters, containing a charge of murder, were raised against a party who was infest, in fee simple, in a land estate; before citation, he executed a disposition of the estate, ex facie absolute, in favour of a friend who was truly a trustee for his behoof, and who was immediately infest; the party fled, and was afterwards “decerned and adjudged to be an outlaw and fugitive from his majesty’s laws,” and ordained to be put to the horn (all in common form), by sentence of the Court of Justiciary, “for his contempt and disobedience in not appearing this day and place, in the hour of cause, to have underlyen the law for the crime of murder, as mentioned in the said criminal letters;” this sentence was followed by denunciation at the horn, as a rebel, which was duly recorded: the party lived abroad for many years, and died unrelaxed: in the interval, by a formal deed, he directed his trustee to execute a strict entail in favour of his (the party’s) only son, whom failing, his only daughter; and he farther directed his estate to be burdened with a provision of £5000, in favour of the daughter; the trustee executed the requisite deeds, and passed infestment on them in the party’s life, and, after his death, applied to the Court in his own name, and obtained a warrant to record the entail, which was done: the son of the outlaw raised a reduction of the whole of these deeds, especially the entail and the application to the Court to record it:—Held, by the whole Court unanimously, that the deeds were unchallengeable at his instance, and that the entail was duly recorded; a majority of nine judges* being of opinion, (1.) That “the consequences of a denunciation on a horning are not different from those of fugitation in the criminal Court, or in any respect less severe, with the exception of the distinctions introduced by express statute, or, in one or two instances, rendered necessary, either from the different forms of procedure in the civil and the criminal courts, or from obvious views of expediency and justice:” (2.) That the fee of the heritage remained in the outlaw: and, (3.) That “the outlaw retained every power of disposing of his property which could be exercised without prejudice to the rights of those who might have an interest in his single or liferent escheat:”—and the remaining four† judges, holding, on the one hand, that though the fee of the heritage remained in the outlaw, yet, as he was “civilly dead,” and “had lost the law of the land,” and “could claim no privilege or benefit under it,” he was not in a capacity to perform the acta legitima implied in making a deed of entail, and therefore any such deed, executed by him after outlawry, would be unavailing; but, holding (along with several of the other Judges), on the other hand, that in respect of the ex facie absolute disposition and infestment, prior to outlawry, the subsequent deed of entail by the ex facie absolute disponee was valid, at least against this pursuer, being unchallengeable, so far as regarded the form of the title, and it not being a relevant reason of reduction that the deed was conformable to the wishes of the outlaw.

Question raised, and opposite opinions expressed, whether, if the outlaw had possessed no power of disposing the fee of his heritage, the entail could have been effectually made by a party who was truly his trustee, and acted under directions received from him during his outlawry.

Homologation.—Circumstances in which the plea was repelled that a deed of entail had been homologated by the heir-at-law.

On 13th April 1790, the late James Macrae of Holmains mortally wounded Sir George Ramsay of Banff in a duel. On 8th May, Macrae, who had fled to France, executed an ex facie absolute disposition of his estate of Holmains, to Lord Glencairn, and Alexander Young, W.S., and the survivor, and their heirs and assignees. Infestment passed under the precept in this deed, on 15th May, and was afterwards duly recorded. This conveyance was truly in trust for behoof of Macrae.

Macrae v.
Macrae.
1st DIVISION
Ld. Moncrieff

Criminal letters, containing a charge of murder, were raised against Macrae, at the instance both of the public and private prosecutors, and the will of the letters directed messengers-at-arms, in common form, to charge him to appear, "to underlie the law for the crime above mentioned, and that, under the pains contained in the acts of Parliament, and that ye charge him, if within Scotland, &c., to come and find the said caution and surety acted in manner foresaid, &c., under the pain of rebellion and putting of him to the horn; wherein if he fail, the said respective terms being bygone and the said surety not found, nor no intimation made by him to you, of the finding thereof, that incontinent thereafter, ye denounce him our rebel, and put him to the horn, escheat and inbring all his moveable goods and gear to our use, for his contempt and disobedience, and that ye, within fifteen days thereafter, cause register these our letters, with the executions thereof, in our books of adjournal, conform to act of Parliament."

On 26th May, Macrae was cited, under these letters, to appear and stand trial before the Court of Justiciary, on 26th July. On that day he failed to appear, and the Court, on the motion of the public prosecutor, "decerned and adjudged him to be an outlaw and fugitive from his Majesty's laws, and ordained him to be put to his Majesty's horn, and all his moveable goods and gear to be escheat and inbrought to his Majesty's use, for his contempt and disobedience in not appearing this day and place, in the hour of cause, to have underlyen the law for the crime of murder, as mentioned in the said criminal letters raised against him thereunto." Letters of denunciation were raised on the following day charging messengers "to denounce him our rebel, and put him to the horn, escheat and inbring all his moveable goods and gear to our use, for his being an outlaw and a fugitive from our laws for the crime foresaid." These letters were executed and recorded on July 28th and 29th.

In April 1793, after the death of Lord Glencairn, the surviving disponee Alexander Young, W.S., executed a disposition of Holmains, in favour of Messrs Duncombe, Pettiwood, and Le Maistre, and of the survivor of them, and their assignees. Infestment followed on this conveyance. In June following, these gentlemen executed a deed, declaring that the conveyance was granted to them "in trust only, for the use and behoof of the said James Macrae, Esquire, his heirs and disponees, and for the support and maintenance of his family, &c." And they bound themselves "to denude of this trust whenever so required by the said

No. 21. James Macrae and his heirs or disponees, and to dispose the lands, &c. to the said James Macrae himself, or any other person having right from him to the same."

Nov. 22, 1836.
Macrae v.
Macrae.

Macrae was married prior to the deed, and on 2d January, 1791, a son was born in London of the marriage, named James Charles Macrae. In 1800 a daughter was born, named Maria Le Maistre Macrae. In May 1807, Macrae executed a deed, narrating the disposition by Young to Duncombe and others; their declaration of trust, and certain subsequent testamentary dispositions, after which the deed proceeded,—"and therefore, for the more effectually accomplishing the purpose of the said deeds, and for other onerous and good causes and considerations me hereunto moving, I am desirous that the said lands, and others before specified shall be settled and disposed of in manner after mentioned, and do, by these presents, not only desire, but also authorize, direct; and appoint the said Charles Duncombe, Roger Pettiward, and John Gustavus Le Maistre, Esqs., and the survivors and survivor of them, not only to alter and revoke the destination of the said lands and estate, but also, with all convenient speed, to execute and deliver a regular disposition and deed of entail, agreeable to the laws of Scotland with regard to entails, and containing all usual and necessary clauses for giving and disposing in strict entail the said lands and estate of Holmains, and others, with pertinents thereof, all as more fully and particularly described in the disposition first herein before mentioned, to and in favour of the said James Macrae, my only son, and the heirs whomsoever of his body; whom failing, the said Maria Le Maistre Macrae, my only daughter, and the heirs whomsoever of her body; whom failing, my nearest heirs whatsoever." The deed directed the trustees to pay £700 per annum out of the rents of Holmains, to Macrae himself, during his lifetime, and to apply the residue of the rents for behoof of his children. It appointed Mrs Macrae, whom failing, other parties, to be tutors and curators to the children; and it ratified a deed by which the trustees, in 1805, had burdened a portion of Holmains, with a provision of £5000 to his daughter, declaring it to be in full of all that she could claim through his decease.

In 1809 the trustees executed a strict entail of Holmains, in terms of these directions, and in the same year James Charles Macrae was infeft by them under the precept contained in their deed of entail. In 1812 he came of age. In 1820, his father, Macrae senior, died abroad, without having ever obtained letters of relaxation. About six months after this event, the trustees, Duncombe and others, produced the deed of entail before the Court of Session, and petitioned, in their own names, to have it recorded in the register of tailzies. No opposition was made, and the Court granted warrant to record it, which was accordingly done. James Charles Macrae entered into possession of the estate, and afterwards adopted various steps on the supposition that the entail was unchallengeable, such as obtaining, in 1824, an Act of Parliament to sell a portion of it, and pay debts affecting the estate; following up this with certain judicial procedure for ascertaining the amount of debt, and valuing the portion of the estate which should be sold; disposing his interest in the estate, in 1821, to a trustee for creditors, in such terms as to guard against the risk of committing any irritancy, if the entail should be effectual, but acknowledging the entail only in so far as it should be found binding on him; and giving statutory notice, in 1829, under 10 Geo. III. c. 51, to his sister (who was now married to Mr John Hyndman, advocate) when about to make improvement-expenditure on the estate.

In 1831 he raised a reduction of all the deeds executed by his father or his trustees, and especially the entail of 1809, and his father's mandate, or deed of 1807, which authorized and directed the entail. The main ground of reduction was, that his father, being an outlaw and fugitive, by sentence of the Court of Justiciary, and never relaxed, was personally incapacitated from executing, directly or indirectly, any deed affecting his heritable estate. The action concluded for declarator of the pursuer's right to complete his titles to Holmains, in fee-simple, as heir of line of his father; or, at least, if the first disposition by his father, on 8th May, 1790, was good to the effect of supporting the subsequent trust-conveyance to Duncombe and others, that these trustees should be decreed to denude, and to execute a conveyance of Holmains to him in fee-simple.

Mrs Maria Macrae or Hyndman and husband lodged defences, pleading, 1st, Homologation<sup>1</sup>; 2d, That the entail was within the powers of the late James Macrae; and, 3d, That, at all events, it was unchallengeable unless the ex facie absolute disposition, on 8th May, 1790, divesting Macrae, could be cut down, which however was unchallengeable, as it was prior to citation under the criminal letters.

The Lord Ordinary ordered Cases, and thereafter "made avizandum with the cause to the Court."

But the Lord Ordinary, though he has carefully considered the argument, both in a very full hearing and in the revised cases, thinks it proper to report the cause, without at present expressing any opinion; because it will be seen, that he was the counsel who was privately consulted by the pursuer in 1820, and that something in the argument turns on the nature and effect of that consultation. The only observation he has to make is, that, when it is ascertained that the sentence of the Justiciary was followed by denunciation of the deceased as an outlaw, duly recorded, if the case of the defenders were to depend entirely on the proposition in law, anxiously and confidently maintained by them in this case, that such an outlaw is under no other or different disability from the consequences of legal acts, than that which attaches to a person denoun-

[Macrae v.
Macrae.]

The Court intimated an Opinion, that, in the special circumstances, no homologation of the entail had taken place; but, in regard to the effect of the sentence of outlawry, and the recorded denunciation, their Lordships were divided in opinion, and a hearing in presence was ordered.

Before the cause was finally disposed of, a supplementary reduction was raised, chiefly to strike at the petition by Duncombe and others to record the entail in the register of tailzies; the warrant granted by the Court to record it; and the registration of it.

The record in this action was laid before the Court along with the original cause, but the actions were not conjoined.

Pleaded by the Pursuer—

1. By the sentence of the Court of Justiciary the late James Macrae had been adjudged an outlaw and fugitive from his Majesty's laws. This sentence alone deprived him of all protection of the law, and of every right or privilege under the law.<sup>1</sup> Such a person is declared by institutional writers to be civilter mortuus;<sup>2</sup> or, as others express it, amittit legem terræ.<sup>3</sup> He could neither sue nor defend in any court of justice; having no persona standi in judicio. Such a party was incapacitated from executing any deed affecting his heritable estate,<sup>4</sup> because every such deed must derive all its force from the law, and he and his deeds were equally cut off from all countenance or support by the law. And it was not only in point of legal principle, but also in point of public policy, that the courts of law refused to recognise the person or the deed of an outlaw. Where a party, charged with murder, kept himself at large, and refused to stand a trial, it was the policy of the law, for the better preservation of the peaceful lieges, to disable him utterly of all

2. As Macrae was also put to the horn, and denounced a rebel, and remained unrelaxed for year and day, his liferent escheat fell.<sup>1</sup> But though the continued contempt of the rebel, in not appearing, tended to strengthen the plea that courts of law could not recognise his deed, it was not a necessary element in founding that plea, which, on the contrary, resulted necessarily from his sentence of outlawry and fugitation.

Macrae v.
Macrae.

3. An alien, though no fault was imputable to him, yet merely because he was not liable in the allegiance of a subject, could neither hold heritage himself, nor execute a deed disposing of heritage; and, a fortiori, an outlaw and rebel, fugitive from the laws to which he owed allegiance, could not be permitted to execute a deed affecting heritage. The fee indeed remained in him, but his power over it was gone. By his liferent escheat, the feu became void, and his immediate superior drew the profits during his natural life; after which his heir, who would have taken up the estate, had he actually died at the moment when he was thrust beyond the pale of the law, could take up the estate, without being affected by any deed executed in the interval by the outlaw.

4. It was extremely doubtful if denunciation at the horn, for a civil case, such as non-payment of debt, was ever placed on the same footing with denunciation at the horn, following on a sentence of outlawry and fugitation, in a criminal court. But at least there had been a marked distinction between the two cases,<sup>2</sup> for many generations, owing to the increasing civilisation of the country, aided by the circumstance, that civil denunciation proceeds upon a mere fiction of rebellion, and never could have been allowed, in a commercial country, to produce the effect of actual outlawry or the loss of a persona standi judicio. Although therefore a party, denounced for civil rebellion, retained a jus disponendi as to his heritable estate, this afforded no analogy for inferring that the same jus disponendi remained to the outlaw, who was denounced a rebel by a criminal court.

5. The whole series of deeds under reduction being mere trust-deeds for behoof of the outlaw, were equally liable to reduction as if they had been directly executed by the outlaw himself.<sup>3</sup> Or if the deed of 8th

Macrae v.
Macrae.

6. But in any event the application to record the entail, and the warrant to record it in the register of tailzies, ought to be reduced, not only because the parties who presented it were mere mandataries and trustees of an outlaw, who were not entitled to appear in judicio, any more than their constituent; but also because their mandate fell by the death of Macrae, which had occurred about six months previously.

Pleaded by Defenders—

1. The late James Macrae had never been convicted of any crime. He had been accused, and charged to appear; and, for disobedience to that command, he had been denounced an outlaw and a rebel. But this offence was precisely analogous to that which is committed, in civil cases, when a party is denounced at the horn as a rebel for not obeying a command on the King's letters, such as to pay a debt or perform a deed. In all these cases alike, the offence is one and the same, being disobedience, or rebellion against a charge contained in the King's letters: and in all, the rebel must be presumed innocent of every other offence or crime. Such was the rule of the law of Scotland, which never dealt with a fugitive, as with a convicted criminal,<sup>1</sup> but merely punished his contempt for not appearing. From the earliest times therefore, until now, with the exception of certain limited statutory modifications,<sup>2</sup> the legal consequences of civil rebellion had always been as severe as those of outlawry and rebellion under the sentence of a criminal court.<sup>3</sup> This was strongly evinced by the necessity of specially enacting, by 1612, c. 3, that if a party, at the horn, for a civil cause, was murdered, his condition of outlawry should not be pleadable as a defence for the murderer.

2. The penal consequences of rebellion or outlawry were not to be extended by implication. And although, in the case of continued contempt, the liferent escheat fell, of any rebel who remained unrelaxed<sup>4</sup> for year and day, that did not take the fee out of the rebel, which, on

The rebel was also left at full power to affect the fee, by every deed which did not prejudice the Crown, and its donatar to the single escheat, or the immediate superior of the rebel, who was the party interested in the liferent escheat: and it was ius tertii to any other party, to challenge any of the rebel's deeds whatever.<sup>2</sup> And the law of England was similar to ours in those cases where they did not hold outlawry to be equivalent to an actual conviction of the crime charged against the outlaw.<sup>3</sup>

3. A deed of settlement and entail was certainly within the power of any party though denounced a rebel for a civil cause; and it was equally so, when he was denounced by a criminal court. There were numerous precedents for this.<sup>4</sup>

4. But, separately, Macrae had divested himself, by an ex facie absolute disposition, as early as 8th May, 1790, followed by infestment on 18th May, all which was prior to his citation under the criminal letters, and therefore unchallengeable. The subsequent conveyances, ending with the entail of 1809, were not executed by him, but by the liege-privies who stood feudally vested in the fee of the estate. These deeds were not reducible merely because they were conformable to the wishes of Macrae. Had they been opposite to his directions, he might have been disabled by personal incapacity from complaining; but his heir had no title to reduce them because they were such as he had desired.

5. The petition to record the entail was regularly presented by Duncombe and others as acting for the heirs-substitute, any one of whom might have applied in his own name. And their authority to make the application was not contained in any simple mandate which fell by the death of the mandant, but in a deed which necessarily subsisted after his death, and was so intended to subsist.

No. 21. The cause was first advised, by their Lordships of the First Division,
 Nov. 22, 1836. on 4th February, 1834, when the following Opinions were delivered :—
 Macrae v.
 Macrae.

LORD BALGRAY.—This is a case of much difficulty, And first, in regard to the question whether there is any important difference between being put to the horn for a civil cause, or in consequence of a sentence of fugitation and outlawry in a criminal court; it appears to me that Stair, Erskine, and above all Mackenzie, lay it down that rebellion was regarded in the same light in civil and criminal causes. And I proceed upon the footing that they still are so, with the exception of certain specific modifications introduced by comparatively modern statutes. And it is clear that a sentence of fugitation does not proceed on the assumption that the fugitive is guilty of the crime charged against him, or that he is dealt with in any respect as if convicted thereof. It is a sentence following exclusively on the disobedience and contempt of the fugitive, in failing to obey the citation, and appear in Court to abide by the award of the laws, after a trial. The fugitive is therefore entitled to the legal presumption to which any other party is entitled till convicted, that he is an innocent man. In these circumstances I conceive that there are certain consequences following on outlawry, and denunciation at the horn, which are of a well-defined and limited character, and have long been known to the law. The denounced rebel has no persona standi in judicio. His single escheat instantly falls, and the King may seize on his moveables. If the denunciation continues for year and day, the rebel's liferent escheat falls, and the rents and profits of any crown lands which he may have, fall to the crown, while those of any of his other lands, fall to the respective immediate superiors thereof. But except the Crown or its donatary, and the immediate superior of the rebel, I think no other party has an interest in the consequences of the denunciation. In particular, the fee of his lands remains in the rebel, and is not forfeited by rebellion. Rebellionis pœna non est feudi amissio. On considering these well-known and established results, which are of a marked and definite character, I think it an attempt, attended with much difficulty, to carry the consequences of rebellion farther, and to hold that the jus disponendi of the rebel is destroyed. Even if a man was tried and convicted of a capital crime, and sentenced to death, is it maintained that he has no power of disposing his heritage? In the present case, there is nothing but a sentence of fugitation, followed by denunciation at the horn, and I cannot think that this is to have the effect of taking away the jus disponendi, which indeed would be assimilating it to the consequences following on an actual conviction of high-treason, which is a very different case from this. And yet I think the pursuer's argument would place the mere fugitive, and the convicted traitor, on the same footing, as to the jus disponendi, to which I cannot assent.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I concur with Lord Balgray in thinking that the fee is not actually taken out of the rebel by denunciation at the horn, but it is quite a separate question whether he, being an outlaw, has a power of executing any deed which shall be valid in law, so as to affect his heritable estate. If he could execute such a deed it would always have been in his power, after his single escheat fell, to defeat the liferent escheat altogether by disposing away his heritage before he had been year and day at the horn. But I doubt much whether he had such a power of disposing. It is not enough to say that the fee continues in a party after his outlawry. The fee may be in him, and yet he may be affected with a personal incapacity, which entirely prevents him from altering the destination which the law would give to that fee, in the event of his death without executing any disposition of it. If he died intestate, his heir-at-law would take it up, and I incline, at present, to the opinion that the outlaw cannot execute any disposition which shall be allowed to disinherit his heir, or in any degree to impair, the right which the law, by its own course, would confer after his death, on his heir. I am not prepared to assent to the doctrine that the consequences of a sentence of outlawry, by a criminal court, are the same with those of denunciation at the horn, in a civil cause. The outlaw, according to Baron Hume, forfeits his person in law, amittit legem suam; he cannot appear in court in any cause; he is decerned and adjudged an outlaw and fugitive from the laws, and ordained to be put to the horn and denounced a rebel. And even supposing that the denunciation at the horn never followed on the outlawry, still the sentence of outlawry would remain, and the person of the outlaw would be civilly dead, and could not be recognised in a court of law. And that leads me to observe the specialty which occurs in this case, that there was an application made to the court to have the entail recorded. This was made by the trustees of the outlaw, acting under the deed by which he authorized and directed them to make the entail. But as the Court could not have entertained a petition in the outlaw's own name, I doubt whether they could entertain it on the part of persons who clearly were his trustees and mandataries. I incline to think it should be dealt with, in any event, as an unrecorded entail.

Macrae v.

Macrae.

LORD CRAIGIE was for repelling the reasons of reduction; and was understood to concur in the views of Lord Balgray. His Lordship also observed that the question, whether the entail had been effectually recorded, was only of importance in a question with creditors, and not in this question inter-heredes.

LORD GILLIES.—I incline to concur with your Lordship, but, as the question involves an application of principles of some novelty and importance, I think it should be farther discussed before any decision is pronounced. I consider it to be attended with much difficulty, to decide as to the alleged difference between rebellion for a civil cause, and rebellion following on a sentence of outlawry. In both cases alike the law originally was, that the single escheat fell, in consequence of rebellion; and that if the rebel remained at the horn for a year and day, the immediate superior of any lands belonging to him, might enter to them and reap their annual fruits and profits, as he was left without a vassal. But even the right of a donator to the liferent escheat was not completed until he obtained a decree of declarator. In looking to this state of the law, I feel that there is considerable difficulty in holding that it is not jus tertii to any other party, except the Crown or the immediate superior, to object to any deed by the rebel, disposing of his estate. At the same time, even although nothing but the moveables, and the profits of the heritable estate during a rebel's life, fell under the single and liferent escheat, consequent on rebellion, it is quite another question whether he, being an outlaw, can make a deed, good in law, to dispose the fee of his heritable estate. The fee is undoubtedly in him, but that does not solve the difficulty. The fee of the estate may be unquestionably in an infant of a month old, but such infant can execute no disposition to affect it. And I rather incline, at present, to hold that an outlaw cannot effectually dispose the fee of his heritable estate. In regard to the petition for recording the entail, it could not have been effectually presented by the outlaw, pro persona standi, and his mandatary or trustee is no better than himself.

in consequence of this would be, to deal with the deed as an unrecorded

No. 21. entail, and in this question, inter heredes, it is immaterial whether it be recorded or not.

Macrae v.
Macrae.

The Court ordered Supplementary Cases, which were advised on July 9th, 1834, at which time Lord Mackenzie sat as a Judge of the First Division, in consequence of the death of Lord Craigie.

LORDS PRESIDENT, BALGRAY, and GILLIES, adhered to their opinions already delivered.

LORD MACKENZIE.—It appears to me that, after sentence of fugitation and outlawry, followed by denunciation at the horn, the personal disqualification attaching to the rebel, was not total, but was of a definite and limited character. I do not think that a charge of horning, following on a sentence of fugitation and outlawry in a criminal court, is attended with more severe consequences, than a charge of horning in a civil cause. In the latter case, it is true that some special and limited modifications have been introduced by statute; but, laying aside these, I cannot allow higher effects to follow on the sentence of fugitation, than on the denunciation at the horn. In truth it is because the party is an outlaw and fugitive that he is put to the horn, and declared a rebel for his contempt, and no consequences of greater severity than this are to follow on the outlawry. The pronouncing sentence of outlawry, was just the mode adopted of proceeding to declare him a rebel at the horn; and it seems to me that declaring a man a rebel, is just as incapacitating an act, as declaring him an outlaw. As I consider that the disqualifications resulting from being put to the horn, do not deprive a party of the fee of his heritage, or of the power of disposing of it, I incline to repel the reasons of reduction.

As the Court were equally divided in opinion, a hearing in presence, by one counsel on each side, was ordered; after which the whole cause, along with additional cases, was laid before the Judges of the Second Division, and the permanent Lord Ordinary, under this interlocutor:—
“Remit to the Lords of the Second Division, and permanent Lords Ordinary, and request their Lordships’ opinions, either severally or collectively, on the question, ‘Whether the deed of entail executed by Mr Duncombe and others, by mandate of 6th May 1807 from the late Mr Macrae, then under sentence of outlawry and fugitation by the High Court of Justiciary, for failing to appear to answer to an indictment for murder, be liable to reduction at the instance of his son the pursuer, his heir-at-law?’”

LORD MEDWYN.—Before considering the question as to the effect of a sentence of outlawry and fugitation by the High Court of Justiciary, for failing to appear to answer to an indictment for murder, it may be useful to advert to what has been established in other countries as the consequences of a similar proceeding.

It seems to be the natural result of those principles which bind society together, that submission to the law demands from the law the reciprocal duty of protec- tion; whereas disobedience to the law, and rejection of its authority, relieves from this obligation, and leaves the outlaw beyond the pale, and consequently the protection, of the law. "Mercy was never extended to the outlaw:" he was said to bear "a wolf's head;" and, like the wild beast to whom he was compared, he was slain whenever he approached the haunts of human kind. He was also emphatically termed, "The friendless man"—one who had forfeited his country, who had lost the countenance of his kinsman, and the protection of his King. He had broken the compact which united him to society. Every hand might be raised to strike him; none to revenge his fall.<sup>1</sup> This was the state of the law at one time in Norway,<sup>2</sup> in Denmark and Jutland,<sup>3</sup> in Saxony,<sup>4</sup> in The Empire,<sup>5</sup> in most of the States of Italy,<sup>6</sup> and probably in other countries. It is of more importance to us to observe, that it was so also among the Anglo-Saxons; and, according to Craig,<sup>7</sup> "Illud tamen de pace domini regis fracta, licet ex Anglo-Saxonum regum statutis descenderet, tenacissime Conquæstor retinuit." It was by a law of Edward the Confessor, which was adopted among the Norman laws, and confirmed after the Conquest, that where an offender does not appear, "utlagat eum Rex verbo oris sui. Si vero postea repertus fuerit et retineri possit vivus, regi reddatur, vel caput ejus si se defenderit, lupinum enim gerit caput. Et hæc est lex communis et generalis de omnibus utlagatis."<sup>8</sup>

Nov. 22, 1
Macrae v.
Macrae.

This addition is made because the law itself is applicable to an offence against the church, De fractione pacis ecclesie, when it is followed up by restoring to the civil power. For these severe consequences were the result of civil offences, as well as ecclesiastical, but of course in those cases only where the party had been guilty of felony. "An outlawed felon was said to have caput lupinum, and might be knocked on the head like a wolf by any one that should meet him, because, having renounced all law, he was to be dealt with as in a state of nature."<sup>9</sup>

It arises from this, that, in England, in prosecutions for offences against the person, such as murder, or assault, or rape, the indictment still bears that the violence has been committed, as even in the latter case it is said to be, "on and upon one A. J., spinster, in the peace of God, and of our said lord the king,"<sup>10</sup> as being the only persons whose safety from injury, the law was bound to protect, or to avenge its infraction.

The law continued in this state till the beginning of the reign of Edward III., when "it was resolved by the Judges, for avoiding of inhumanity and effusion of Christian blood, that it should not be lawful for any man but the sheriff only (having lawful warrant therefor) to put to death any man outlawed, though it were for felony."<sup>11</sup>

Iacrae.

The original severity of the law, however, still remained in one case; the case of judgment being given against a defendant upon a præmunire facias: "he was put out of the King's protection, and might have been slain by any man, without any danger of law. But Queen Elizabeth and her Parliament,<sup>1</sup> liking not the extreme and inhuman rigour of the law in that point, did provide that it should not be lawful for any person to slay any one, in any manner, attainted in or upon a præmunire."<sup>2</sup>

But though an outlaw is now thus far protected, yet, if he has been indicted for a capital offence, and does not appear, and is outlawed, this "amounts to a conviction of the crime, as much as if he had been actually found guilty by the verdict of a jury. And if he be subsequently taken and committed to prison, the justices of gaol-delivery may award any execution against him."

"In misdemeanours inferior to felony, the consequences, though not so penal, are highly serious, and generally more severe than would be inflicted for the crime of which the outlaw stands accused or convicted: but it does not indeed operate as a conviction of the offence, for the party may be afterwards tried and convicted; but it operates as a conviction for the contempt in not answering. It subjects the party to forfeiture of goods and chattels, the loss of profits of real estates, and restraint of liberty. In consequence, it does not materially differ from those which ensue on civil process."<sup>3</sup>

It was after the barbarous doctrine was rejected that an outlaw was beyond the protection of the law, that the process of outlawry was by the law of England applied, in the case of misdemeanours as well as in civil actions, as the punishment generally applicable "for a contempt in avoiding the execution of the process of the King's Court. In civil actions, however, it is rather in the nature of a process to compel the defendant to submit to the jurisdiction of the Court. If outlawed upon mesne-process, he may, on putting in and perfecting bail, or entering on appearance, reverse the outlawry, as of course: if upon final process, he may reverse the outlawry upon payment of the debt and costs."<sup>4</sup>

If he does not, he is liable, as in cases of contempt in misdemeanours, to forfeiture of goods and chattels, the loss of profits of real estates, and restraint of liberty. "Besides the forfeiture, the outlaw is incapable of suing in any action for redress of any injury, and of sitting on a jury to try any issue; but he may be allowed to give evidence as a witness, though not to try as a juror; and he may make a will, and appoint executors, by whom the outlawry may be reversed, if the proceedings are defective; and he may sit in the House of Commons as a member."<sup>5</sup>

Such appear to be the rules of the law of England as to outlawry, and they have been adverted to, in the first instance, as affording a not uninteresting or unuseful introduction to the consideration of the principles and practice of our own law on this subject, and illustrative of the different views which have been adopted, in some respects, by the laws of the two countries, as well as of the points in which they agree. In discussing this matter, great industry and antiquarian knowledge have been exerted by the counsel; but the subject is not exhausted.

In both countries, the origin of the doctrine, as might be expected, is to be found in cases of felony where the accused declines to appear and abide his trial; the consequence of which was, that with us he was declared a rebel. Originally, the person accused required to be four times summoned, and it was only on his failure to appear at the fourth court that he was declared fugitive.<sup>1</sup> This tedious process came in time to be abridged, and "it was enacted, that, in processes before the Justiciar, the second summons, instead of the fourth, shall be peremptory; so that if the person summoned appear not on the second summons, he shall be put to the horn, as was in use formerly on the fourth summons."<sup>2</sup> Then the diet of compearance is made peremptory by 1584, c. 140, and not with continuation of days.

Ori-Macrae v.

Macrae.

It never was a rule of our law, as it was in England, that the non-appearance of the accused was to be held such a proof of his guilt, that it was to supersede the necessity of a trial for the offence, if he should afterwards be found within the kingdom. The consequences of a sentence of outlawry, or putting to the horn, were "as a punishment of his contumacy and rebellion" (so it is construed) "in disobeying the will of the King's letters, which order him to appear and underlie the law. In contemning this injunction, he is held to have cast off his allegiance as a subject, and to have entered into a state of rebellion to the law and the sovereign of the land."<sup>3</sup>

At the same time, it seems at one period of our law to have been held, that being at the horn for the crime, and remaining long unrelaxed, was sufficient evidence of guilt, where no defence was set up; so that the production of the letters of horning is often the only evidence laid before the assize; as, for instance, this is the course adopted in the case of William Cunninghame (15th December, 1601), and of George Trumbill (23d August, 1603).<sup>4</sup>

The object of outlawry is to compel the accused to appear, or to drive him out of the country, by putting him out of the protection of the law.<sup>5</sup> This form was even adopted by the Court of Session, and that so late as 1741, in a complaint against Alexander Newlands for subornation of perjury. He had absconded, and, as no criminal trial could proceed against him in absence, the question occurred, under what certification the Court could ordain him to appear. On a search of precedents, the Court, on the narrative that he had been searched for and not found, granted warrant to ordain him to appear under pain of rebellion and being put to the horn; wherein if he failed, that they would denounce him his Majesty's rebel, and put him to the horn, and escheat and inbring his moveable goods, for his Majesty's use, for his contempt and disobedience.<sup>6</sup> This case is reported both by Kilkerran and Kames.<sup>7</sup>

When a criminal was fugitive or at large, the usual course came to be to cite him, upon criminal letters, to come and find caution to appear to underlie the law; and failing his doing so, the messenger is authorized to declare him a rebel, and put him to the horn. The effect of this was to authorize his apprehension, so as to place him at the bar on the day of trial. The form by indictment was the

Macrae v.
Macrae.

In the case of criminal letters, if the party accused did not appear, the Court declared him an outlaw and fugitive, and his moveable goods to be escheat.

Even where a criminal charge was not specifically ascertained against any person but being suspected of being guilty, he had been required by the Secret Council to appear "and answer to sic things as sould be laid to his charge;" if disobeyed this charge, letters were then granted, with the advice of the Secret Council, charging the party to appear on a certain day, "under pain of rebellion and putting of him to the horne; and gif he failzie therein, the said day being past, to denounce him rebel, and put him to the horn and escheat." As an ample of this, reference may be made to the proceedings against James, Earl Murray (1st August, 1565), who is accordingly denounced rebel on the 6th not obeying this charge;<sup>1</sup> as well as to the proceedings against the Earl of Morton, Lord Lindsay, and their accomplices in the murder of Rizzio (8th June 1566).<sup>2</sup> The proceedings as there given from the Privy Council Records, highly instructive.

This form of procedure was put an end to by 1585, c. 13, in ordinary cases abolishing "letters to compear super inquirendis, or to enter their persons in wair or to do anie deed under the pains of treason or rebellion; and in case of failure denunce without calling or cogniton tane of before."

Horning was applied in all cases of disobedience to the King's letters. By statute 1584, c. 140, it was provided, that the prosecutors who were obliged to find caution to follow out their accusation, should further find caution not to enter the Court with more than the number prescribed in the act 1555, c. 1, and the accused in like manner, in finding caution to appear, is also to find caution not to have a greater number of friends than law admits, which were four for the pursuer, and the defender to have six, to come into Court along with him, if they appear with a greater number, "their soverties sall be unlawed, as gif they had not compeired, and they sall be adjudged fugitive fra the law, and put to the horne, and their escheit inbrocht;" and, in like manner, those exceeding the prescribed number are to be denounced as rebels "for their contemption," and registration in the books of adjournal is sufficient.

We never admitted of any criminal prosecution before the Justiciar against an absent party, except to a limited extent, for certain species of treason, by 1585, c. 69. But in trials for treason before the Parliament, as a Court of judicature, the case was different. If the party accused failed to appear, sentence was pronounced at the fourth Court against the accused, as if he had been present and defended himself, and convicted notwithstanding his absence. I may refer to the proceedings against the last Popish Archbishop of St Andrews, and other accessories of Queen Mary, after her escape from the Castle of Lochleven.<sup>3</sup> They did not appear, but sentence is given, that they have committed treason, that they have forfeited their lands and moveable goods to the King, that their dignities, names, and memories are for ever to be extinct, and "they to underlye the pane of treason and just punishment destinatt of the law of the realme for the causes foresaid."

It is a historical fact, that the Archbishop, having afterwards been taken prisoner in the Castle of Dunbarton, was hanged at Stirling on 1st April, 1570, in consequence of the above sentence, without any new trial;<sup>1</sup> strictly according to law, but almost a solitary example of its being enforced, and probably arising out of the strong political and religious feelings, which then persecuted the unfortunate prelate.

The same course was followed in the case of Lord Maxwell.<sup>2</sup> He was summoned before Parliament, and condemned in absence, for treason.<sup>3</sup> He was at that time abroad. The proceedings are instructive. The summons is first found relevant by the Lords of the articles. It is then brought before Parliament, and again found relevant. The evidence is then produced and minutely set down, and then found is pronounced. Having returned to this country, he was apprehended in Edinburgh, and executed at Edinburgh on 18th May, 1613,<sup>4</sup> by warrant from the Privy Council, under the former sentence.

Outlawry was not employed with us as a means of compelling a defender to appear in a civil process.<sup>5</sup> Originally, this was by attaching his moveables till he found caution to appear and answer in judgment;<sup>6</sup> and this whether he withdrew from the jurisdiction of the judge or not. He was then to be summoned three times, and failing his appearance he was outlawed for the expenses of the defender; if he was absent at the fourth summons, his moveables or land, if the plea regarded it, were put into the pursuer's hands.<sup>7</sup>

But letters of horning, and of course outlawry, came to be employed in civil processes, the history of which has not been well traced in our law. Perhaps the earliest notice of it is to be found in an act in the middle of the 15th century, devised by our churchmen, to give greater effect to their decrees. They had by this time obtained a considerable extent of jurisdiction in civil causes, but their only form of either enforcing the appearance of the defender, or compelling implement of their decree, was by excommunication, 1426, c. 86. This sentence was at an early period enforced by caption, issued by the Bishop himself, the law of Robert III. c. 6, be authentic; but this was now to be issued by the King. But by 1449, c. 12, it was provided, that if the defenders "were fugitive, and had lands and gudes, they should be arrested and prysed as for other debts; and if they have no lands or gudes, they shall be put to the King's horne." The act is to endure till the next Parliament.

By another act of the same Parliament, 1449, c. 30, also a temporary act, the form is set down for compelling a defender to compare before the King and Council for any cause; if he fails to appear at the three first diets of compareance, he is condemned in a certain sum of expenses to the pursuer, and an unlaw to the King. If he continue absent, the pursuer was to be put in possession of his lands, if it was a pursuit for them, or his moveables, till these fines and unlaws were paid, and then he might be heard; and "gif he has no lands goods, then sall he be outlawed and put to the King's horne."

In this form, even in the case of one without lands or goods, ever was in force

No. 21. to compel appearance, this could only have been for a short period ; for about this time we adopted the form of process from the Roman law of giving decret in absence. This was at least as early as the end of the 14th century. Probably the oldest judicial record in this country which has been preserved, is to be found in the Burgh Court-Books of Aberdeen ; and there are instances there as early as 7th July and 9th September, 1399, where the defender, not appearing at the fourth diet, the pursuer leads his proof, and the Court decides upon it in absence. The same course is followed on 10th October and 13th October, 1478, in civil processes before Parliament.<sup>1</sup> It was now unnecessary to continue any form for compelling appearance in a civil action ; at the same time when appearance was necessary, this was the only compulsitor. Thus, a reference having been made to the oath of the opposite party, he failed to appear. He is again summoned to appear to depone under pain of rebellion and putting to the horn, and after he has deponed, he is to enter his person in ward in Blackness Castle, for the contempt of the King's authority, under pain of rebellion and putting to the horn.<sup>2</sup>

Macrae v.
Macrae.

Witnesses in a cause having failed to appear, are warned to ward their persons in Blackness Castle, and to compear on the day to which the cause is continued, under the pain of rebellion.<sup>3</sup>

Persons of inquest being on oath, and originally witnesses of the fact they were to find by their verdict, when tried and convicted of error, were held worthy of punishment, as in a case of perjury, and therefore they could not appear by procurators, but were bound to appear personally ; if they failed to compear, they were ordained again to be summoned under pain of rebellion.<sup>4</sup>

As yet we do not find horning or letters of four forms used to compel implement of decree given against a defender in a civil process. The first trace of this in our law is 1535, c. 9, where a defender had been ordained by the Spiritual Court ad factum præstandum, and process of cursing had issued on this decree, and he lay under the process for forty days, for " non-doing or fulfilling of any act or dede ; in that case, the persons, their creditors, sall haue letters in the first, second, third, and fourth forms, according to the ordinares letters of cursing, and this act always to be na prejudice to them that likes to take captions." Hitherto the diligence against a defender was by poinding of his moveables or apprising his land, or by an act of warding within burgh, or caption on a decree of a Spiritual Court. The application of horning to enforce a decree ad factum præstandum, with all its consequences if contemned, was a reasonable extension of this originally criminal process, as obedience must always have been within the power of the party, and disobedience implied a contempt of the royal authority.

A farther and most important step was made by 1551, c. 7, whereby, if a person remained a year under a sentence of cursing, or communicates when he is excommunicated, his moveables are escheated, " providing always, that they at whose instance they are denounced cursed for sums of money, for fulfilling any deed, sall be first satisfied and paid of all sums or other things that they may craue, by virtue of the said letters of cursing, of the said escheit goods." Thus, horning came to enforce decrees of the Church Courts, not ad factum præstandum only, but for payment of a debt after the proper ecclesiastical compulsitor had been despised for a certain term ; and it was under the equitable proviso, that the forfeiture on account of the contempt of the royal authority should be qualified with the burden of paying the debt, which it will be found did not at first, nor for some time, follow as the effect of hornings on decrees of the Civil Courts. This was one of those improvements for which the common law of most countries was indebted to the churchmen, and their study of the equitable rules of the civil and canon laws. At this time, as is well known, the Church Courts throughout Europe generally, and most certainly in this country, had acquired a jurisdiction in every civil case which could be brought under mala fides, or made a case of conscience, or where the contract was fortified by an oath ; so that much of what was purely civil process, was disposed of in these Courts, for which this effectual mode of enforcement had been provided, which secured payment to the creditor on whose diligence the outlawry had proceeded. It thus appears how important and valuable an addition was here made to our law, for the recovery of debts and fulfilment of pecuniary obligations.

By 1555, c. 55, churchmen are no longer to be liable to horning for the aids granted to the Crown by Parliament. It appears that it had been customary to levy these by this form of diligence, by what law, or when introduced, I do not know.

After the Reformation, the act 1572, c. 53, was passed, which required the Lords of Council to direct letters in all the four forms charging the excommunicate persons, remaining so for forty days, to satisfy the sentence or decret pronouncd against them, under the pain of rebellion.

It is generally said, that an important change took place in the execution following on decrees, by an act of sederunt,<sup>1</sup> passed by the Court of Session, " the King's Majesty sittand in judgment,"<sup>2</sup> on the narrative, that execution was often frustrated by simulate and false alienations of their lands and gudes by defenders ; and therefore it enacted, " that letters, as weil of horning as poynding, the ane nocht prejudicial to the other, sall be directed at the will and pleasure of the partie obtainer of the decret, quhidder the same be given upon liquidate summes, or that the execution thair of utherwayes consist in facto." This act of Sederunt was ratified two years afterwards by Parliament.<sup>3</sup>

If the charge to obey the decree was disobeyed, even if the decree was to make payment of a sum, which the party had no means of doing, he was declared a rebel, which is the only certification in the letters of horning, and he was liable to all the consequences of that situation.

But it seems pretty clear from 1579, c. 75, which authorized the register of hornings, and required their registration by the sheriffs, within their sherifffdoms, within fifteen days of denunciation, that hornings were executed at that time for sums of money, and on failure to pay, the party was put to the horn, and his wheat fell ; and it was by this act first provided, that, in process following on a decree of the Civil Court, the creditor was to be paid his debt out of the goods sequestered, with the officer's expenses, the contempt of the royal authority having been previously alone regarded. It was not till 1592, c. 145, that this obligation

By a series of statutes, from 1593, c. 181, to 1612, c. 7, the Court of Session was directed to issue letters of horning in the present form upon a single charge, on decrees of inferior judges; and by an Act of Sederunt, 23d November, 1613, letters of horning on their own decrees were also to be given on a single charge.

In this discussion as to horning in civil process, I have been led away somewhat from the proper object of enquiry—the effect of declaring one an outlaw, and putting him to the horn. When it is recollected that, in criminal causes, the nature of the crime makes no difference on the outlawry, and the offender being fugitive, is not held, as in England, an acknowledgment of guilt; but the Court more properly considers only the disobedience of the citation and contempt of the royal authority, and that the consequence is the same, whether he is cited for murder or for the most petty delinquency, the offence in all being the same; we would naturally expect, that, when the same form came to be applied to disobedience of a charge upon letters-executorial in the King's name, that the contempt being the same, the consequences should be the same also. The warrant contains the same certification in civil as well as criminal process: in the latter, as in criminal letters, it ordains the messenger “that, incontinent thereafter, ye denounce him our rebel, and put him to the horn, escheat and inbring all his moveable goods and gear to our use for his contempt and disobedience;” and the letters of horning on a charge to pay or perform, grant warrant to charge “under pain of rebellion and putting of them to the horn, wherein, if they failzie, that, incontinent thereafter, ye denounce them our rebels and put them to the horn, and escheat and inbring all their moveable goods and gear to our use, for their contempt.” It cannot make the slightest difference that, in the above instances, the party charged is at once declared a rebel on disobedience, by the messenger, on the warrant and authority of the letters; and that, as in the case of a trial by indictment, this sentence is more solemnly pronounced by the Court before which he was summoned to appear. In both the authority is the same; it is the royal authority directed in the one case to messengers, as sheriffs in that part, authorizing them to discharge this branch of judicial duty in a certain event; and in the other, it is the exercise of the same authority inherent in the Court, and conferred at its institution, and for which, accordingly, there neither is, nor is required to be, in the libel any special warrant.

Accordingly, when Sir George Mackenzie observes, in treating of the effects of outlawry for a crime, that a person at the horn is said non habere personam standi in judicio, he distinctly adds, “nor puts our law any distinction between civil and criminal cases;”<sup>1</sup> and he, in effect, lays down the same law in another of his works, in his Observations on 12th Parl. Jas. VI. c. 147, p. 273, anent the Escheat of Rebels:—“Though the Act of Parliament specifies only crimes, yet I conceive that all rebellion is comprehended under the word crimes; for in all cases, even for civil rebellion, not only may the thesaurer seal till caution be found, but even the Lords of Session will, upon a bill, allow the sealing of the rebel's goods at the donator's instance, till caution be found;” and it will be observed, that when Spottiswood, Stair, Bankton, and Erskine discuss the effects of horning on the status or property of the party, it is in their Institutes of our civil law, and when they arise out of civil cases; and they never hint at any different effects from what would occur in a criminal case, from which this form of process was unquestionably adopted. In the following case the two are expressly assimilated, and this doctrine is assented to by the judgment of the Court. "Though sentences of forfeiture upon probation of the crime are drawn back to the date of committing thereof, yet the declaring a person fugitive infers only contempt in not compearing, conform to the will of the letters, upon which nothing falls but the single escheat and the liferent, if the rebel continue year and day unreleased, as in the case of denunciation upon horning."<sup>1</sup> Stair mentions, as the only exception from the usual effects of hornings; "hornings directed against witnesses or havers of writs, to be produced ad probandum;"<sup>2</sup> disobedience there is not to infer rebellion; and the horning is to be followed out by caption.

Nov. 22, 1
Macrae v.
Macrae:

When outlawry was in England adopted in civil process to enforce appearance in Court, or to compel obedience to the orders of Court, it has been already noticed that this was subsequent to the time of Edward III., when some of the harsher features, incident originally to the situation of an outlaw upon a criminal proceeding, had been softened, and it never was made use of as a means of enforcing a judgment. With us, however, it was different; no change had taken place upon the effects of outlawry, when it was adopted as a means to enforce payment or performance; hence the difference as to its effects in the two countries. No doubt there was something very harsh that the same effects should follow on being fugitive on account of a criminal offence inferior only to treason, and disobedience of a charge to pay, not "out of contempt to the King's authority and command, but because they are either not able to perform, or supinely negligent, and ignorant of the denunciation and registration;"<sup>3</sup> and this hardship became the more glaring, according as this mode of enforcing implement came to be extended and applied to other cases than those in which it was originally adopted.

Accordingly, it appears, that, in the Parliament 1567, among the other matters referred to the Lords of the Articles, one was to consider, "that horning is made one comone paine, without respect of causes."<sup>4</sup> But by the marking on the margin of the record, nothing seems to have been done. It appears that the suggestion had been to distinguish between "them that wilfully passes to the horne and lyes thereat, and them that passes to the horne for liquidat sumes, and them that passes at the horne and enters in the girth."<sup>5</sup>

By 1579, c. 13, which first appointed denounced hornings to be registered, each sheriff is to make out a catalogue of such rebels, and affix it on the Market Cross and Tolbooth, before each of the three head Courts: and he is to send a copy of this catalogue, "with a brief note of the causes for whilk they are denounced, to the treasurer." But this does not imply that any distinction was made between the effects of rebellion in a criminal or civil case, for its object is declared, that the party complainer may be paid "of his just debt with the officiar's expenses of the readiest and first end of the escheat."

Macrae v.
Macrae.

The same matter was again brought before the Parliament which met in 1581,<sup>1</sup> for the act 9th of that year, referring to the former commission to the Lords of the Articles, again remits this matter in the very same terms, and in the same three heads as before.

These remits, as well as some other considerations, make me hesitate in adopting the usual opinion as to the object and effect of the Act of Sederunt 1582, already adverted to, that it first authorized the use of letters of four forms to enforce decrees for debt; and I am rather inclined to hold, that the alteration introduced was the very important one, that execution was to be competent both against the person and the goods, the one without prejudice to the other. When a debtor was denounced rebel and put to the horn, and he entered his person in ward, conform to the said letters, no diligence could be done against his goods or lands; and it was only decided in 1558, that warrant will be given to poind the moveables and apprise the heritage, provided the debtor in such a case be first put to liberty.<sup>2</sup> But, be this as it may.

It appears that nothing had followed upon the proceedings already noticed in 1581. Nay, the act 1592, c. 146, for the punishment of receipters of traytors and rebels, distinctly places intercommuners with the one or the other class on the same footing, and their punishment is to suffer "the same paine for quhilk they are forfaulted or put to the horne:"<sup>3</sup> And further, the act 1598 shews that no distinction was yet made as to any class of rebels, and that "the hail horners within the kingdom" were treated in the same manner; the sheriffs were not even now to send a note of the causes for which they were denounced, but the same consequences followed on their rebellion in whatever cause.

Accordingly we find it equally a point of dittay to reset and supply a rebel, at the horn for a civil cause as for a criminal act. Thus, on the 12th March, 1605, Ringan Armstrong and Will Armstrong<sup>4</sup> are tried, among other causes, for this offence, and the act referred to is plainly the act 1540, c. 97, because the penalty is stated in the indictment to be death and the confiscation of moveables; and the persons said to have been resetted were rebels, and at the horn for not making redress and payment in terms of a decree given by the Warden of the West Marches in a court of redress at Dumfries, 29th December, 1587.

The act 1612, c. 3, unquestionably made the first distinction in our law between those at the horn for contempt in a civil and those in a criminal process and when by this law it was enacted, that it should be no defence to the accused that the person slain by him, or mutilated, was at the horn for a civil cause, and when this distinction was thus made between this situation and the homicide of one at the horn for disobeying a citation to underlie the law for a crime, we may surely lay it down, independently of the evidence from the proceedings in Parliament above referred to, that hitherto at least there was no difference as to any of the consequences between the two.

But to consider more particularly the consequences of outlawry, 1st, As it affects the status; and, 2d, The property of the party outlawed.

I. As to the status of the party denounced as a rebel or outlaw, he "hath not personam standi in judicio either as pursuer or defender;"<sup>1</sup> or, as Erskine says, "he is not personable, or, in other words, he cannot appear judicially in any other court, either as pursuer or defender."<sup>2</sup> This naturally results from disobedience to the royal authority, for he cannot be entitled to claim the assistance of the courts of that sovereign whose mandate he contemptuously despises, either in prosecution of his rights, or in defence against wrong. Nay, even his person is not under the protection of the laws, so that they cannot be resorted to to punish even his murderer, for they take cognizance only of offences of those who are subject to them. Although it is said that the rebel is civiliter mortuus, that amittit legem terræ;<sup>3</sup> yet, when these expressions are defined, they import nothing more than this, that he is repelled "ab agendo et defendendo." It is never said he can do no act or deed which will bind himself or his heirs.

Nov. 22, 1
Macrae v.
Macrae.

A rebel, then, while unrelaxed, cannot pursue<sup>4</sup> or defend in any cause;<sup>5</sup> inasmuch, that the wife of a rebel who is conjunct fiar in the lands, cannot defend for her own interest, because she cannot be authorized by her husband, "quhilk he cannot do by reassoun of the horning."<sup>6</sup> Hence it was necessary for Lady Morlane, the wife of Mr Archibald Douglas, who was accused of accession to Darnley's murder, to obtain a special authority to pursue all actions by herself or others in her own name only, regarding her own property. That a person accused of a crime, fugitated, and put to the horn, is repelled, ab agendo, not on account of the crime, but of the rebellion, the contempt of the royal authority in disobeying the summons, will still farther appear from this, that "ane beand criminallie accusit and convict for theft, may nevertheles call and persew for spuilie of guidis and geir pertaining to him, 19th May, 1574, John Cristisone."<sup>7</sup>

In order to enable a person at the horn either to pursue or defend himself, it was necessary to obtain letters of relaxation, and this either in a criminal or civil process, and whether he has been put to the horn for a civil or criminal cause; so true is it, "that our law puts not any distinction on this matter between civil and criminal cases."

Thus, in the case of Patrick Dunbar, 22d June, 1599, the justice found no process at the instance of the private pursuer, he being at the horn for slaughter.<sup>8</sup> On 6th November, 1607, John Forbes is placed at the bar for slaughter. He had been at the horn for not appearing to underlye the law for this crime, and a commission had been granted to apprehend him. The advocate produces the dittay with the letters of horning. The pannel produces a letter of relaxation, and claims the right of being tried as the King's free subject, in respect of the relaxation.<sup>9</sup>

Archibald, Earl of Angus, having raised a reduction of his forfeiture, the Queen's Advocate alleged, that he could not stand in judgment to pursue, because he was put to the horn, till he shew relaxation. His prolocutor accordingly produces a relaxation.

Macrae v.
Macrae.

When the process of forfeiture was instituted in Parliament, and the accused failed to appear, in order to prevent any attempt afterwards to rescind the sentence to be pronounced in absence, on the ground that being at the horn, the party was not safe to appear, it was customary for the King's Advocate to produce a relaxation, although, of course, not applied for by the accused himself.

Thus, in the proceedings against the Archbishop of St Andrew's, and various other friends of Queen Mary's, "and sicklyke the said advocat producit letters gevin under our sovrane lordis signet dewlie execut, relaxand all the foirsaidis personis above writtin fra the process of horning led upoun thame, and every ane of thame, for quhatsumever causs bygane, sua that thai might, without ony feir, compeir and defend in the said causs."<sup>1</sup>

The relaxations produced, it will be observed, are from the process of horning for whatsoever cause or occasion, for it was as necessary to obtain a relaxation from a horning on a civil process as in a criminal pursuit, the effects being the same in both. Stair says, "The Lords do likewise relax parties who are incarcerated and not able to find caution, to give them personam standi in judicio, to the effect that their cause may be discussed while they are in prison."<sup>3</sup> It is in this chapter, entitled "Letters Executorial of Decreets," he is treating of the "effects of horning, whereby decreets and others above mentioned (that is, decrees of registration) attain their end."<sup>4</sup>

Hence Balfour says, "Letters of horning beand execute against ony person, and he denuncet rebel, and put to the horn for not fulfilling of ane decrete given aganis him, the samin sould be suspendit to ane certain day, and the person put to the horn relaxt thairfra, he findand caution to obey and fulfil the said decrete in all punctis; 6th Feb. 1534."<sup>5</sup>

And accordingly the style is given in these words at the end of letters of suspension, "and if the said complainer be already denounced rebel, and put to our horn for the cause foresaid, that ye messengers-at-arms pass to the mercat-cross of and there, in our name and authority, relax him therefrae, receive him to our peace again, and deliver to him, or any other in his name, the wand thereof, and that ye cause registrat the said suspension and relaxation within fifteen days next after he bees relaxed, conform to the act of Parliament."<sup>6</sup>

In order to entitle a party to raise an action for annulling a horning, "he must suspend and relax himself; but the Lords resolved, if the cause of horning was so great as the pursuer was not able to find caution, that they would grant suspension and relaxation super juratoria cautione."<sup>7</sup> So firmly was this fixed, that in a declarator of the Laird of Foulis' liferent-escheat, the gift being granted on divers hornings, and some were used to support the declarator, and another produced to debar the defender a defendendo, "The Lords found that he ought to be relaxed or ever he could be heard to propone improbation, seeing horning, albeit it was

It may be worth while to notice that it was the same in the case of a person excommunicated. By the Canon Law it is laid down, "Reus in qualibet parte huius excommunicationem contra actorem objiciens auditur."<sup>2</sup> With regard to defenders, however, the rule is thus given, "Quia postulasti a nobis, utrum excommunicatus in judicio stare possit; Respondemus quod conveniri potest; et debet per alium respondere in judicio: Ne videatur de sua malitia commodum reportare."<sup>3</sup> But when we adopted from the Roman law the form of a decree in absence, this distinction was unnecessary; and accordingly with us, while an excommunicated person may not pursue, "and na person is holden of the law to mak answer to him, bot gif he pleises to do otherways;"<sup>4</sup> neither can a person cursit and excommunicate, defend in any action or cause.<sup>5</sup> Nov. 22, 1
Macrae v.
Macrae.

On this ground an objection is taken against a summons at the instance of Ellen Lady Grahame, that she was then under the sentence of cursing: The Lords Auditors "finds the exception of avale, and therefore decernis the summons of the said Elene to be of nane effect, force, nor strenth at this tyme."<sup>6</sup>

If a person cursit and excommunicated has an objection to the caption which issued on this sentence, he may suspend without relaxation, as he is not yet declared a rebel, and he is necessarily defending himself against being so declared, 25th January, 1541.<sup>7</sup>

In England "an excommunicated person cannot sue any action, real or personal, but he may be convened and must defend,"<sup>8</sup> because there no decree is given in absence, and therefore his delinquency against the church would operate as a defence and supersedere of all civil process, if the same rule were observed as with us.

But, besides an outlaw not being entitled to come into the King's Court to claim the authority of the laws to enforce his rights or defend against wrongs, the same consequence with us followed as we have seen attended the situation of an outlaw in England, ut gerebat caput lupinum; and his death or mutilation was no point of dittay cognizable by our courts; and it is undoubtedly true that here, too, no difference was made, whether he was fugitive and declared a rebel for an atrocious crime, or was at the horn for not making payment or performance of a decree in a civil action. How this barbarous state of matters arose has been already noticed: While all the consequences of outlawry in felonies remained in full force, the same procedure was in Scotland adopted in civil process, and no restriction or mitigation was introduced: Whereas in England it was not till after the judges modified the consequences of outlawry in felony, that the form was applied to civil process, so that the singular and barbarous effects upon the personal safety of a party outlawed never took place there in civil process, That it did so in Scotland, is too fully shewn by unquestionable public documents.

At the debate a remarkable case was referred to from the records of our criminal

In a feud between the Maxwells and the Crichtons, which long disturbed the county of Dumfries, Douglas of Drumlanrig, who followed the banner of Lord Maxwell, killed Crichton of Kirkpatrick. Douglas was brought to trial by Crichton's heir for murder, and pleaded in defence that Crichton was a rebel, and at the horn at the time of his death, and therefore that he was not liable to punishment for the death of one who was out of protection of the law. This defence was sustained, 24th September, 1512.

v. 22, 1836.
cras.

In consequence of this trial a Convention of the Estates, or perhaps only the Secret Council, was induced to consider the state of the law as to this matter, and passed an act which is entered in the Books of Adjournal,<sup>2</sup> to define this privilege, so that it was only to apply to the slaughter of a rebel at the time of apprehending him; and if he be apprehended and kept safe twenty-four hours after his apprehension, "it shall not be lawful to the keeper, apprehender, or any other person, to slay him, but such shall be reputed manslaughterers." This restriction of the power of putting a rebel to death, when he was safely secured in custody, proved by his remaining there for twenty-four hours, shews what previously was the law as to killing a rebel, and which, even after the passing of this act, was left broad enough to protect such a case as that which was brought against Douglas of Drumlanrig.

This act, I have no doubt, had regard only to rebels under criminal proceedings.

But the above is not the only case where such a defence was sustained. Mackenzie mentions a case where it was found, "that the killing of such as are at the horn for slaughter or other crime, is not criminal, January 1600, Guthrie v. Jardine;"<sup>3</sup> and he further holds, that to kill a person at the horn out of private revenge, would infer no punishment according to the received maxim, bannito occiso per inimicum, occidens non reputatur homicida.<sup>4</sup>

The same law is pleaded in another case which was also tried in 1600, "Robert Auchmowtie for the slaughter of James Vauchope in singular combat, on 19th April last."<sup>5</sup> The defence was, that James was the King's rebel, "put to the horne for non-compeirance to answer to his Majestie, and the counsall, for the tressonabel reset of a rebel," the letters of horning being executed 22d February, 1596.

The answer is, that the horning is and was null from the beginning, and was so declared by the Lords of Council and Session in May last.

Although the decree setting aside the horning is subsequent to the duel, and at the instance of James's heir, to the effect that he might be retoured to his father (which was then necessary, or a license from the King to answer to the head of the brieve that the deceased died at the peace of the King), it is probable that the father and brother of the deceased, who, with the King's advocate, are prosecutors, saw that it was necessary first to obviate the defence that would be set up on the circumstance of his being at the horn. The argument turns on whether the Court of Session had power to set aside a charge given on a decree of the Secret Council, and what is the effect of a horning, even though reducible, while it stands unrededuced? Many quotations are made from the civilians in the pleadings of the parties to prove this position: "Quod bannitum, cujus bannum injustum aut nullum est, impune licet occidere," and, among others, this from Bartolus: "Si intersciens nullitatem sciebat, tum punitur; secus, si hoc ignorabat et quod ignorans, non puniatur;" and from Joannes Andree, "Si quis bannitus fuerit propter pecuniam non solutam, et postea solverit, banno tamen non cancellato, occisus, fuerit, non tenetur pena homicidii."

The deceased was held never to have been at the horn, as the execution by the messenger wanted a statutory solemnity, and the defence was therefore repelled, and the pannel put to the knowledge of an assize, convicted, and executed.

In the pleadings in this case,<sup>1</sup> the Justice is referred to a case as well known to him, where the Laird of Arkinglass, being accused of the slaughter of the Laird of Caddell, alleged na process, because the defunct was slain at the horn, and produced letters of horning at the instance of Mr James Harvie, advocate. This must have been for a civil cause. The answer was, the horning had been reduced as being null from the beginning, so that the decree draws back to the time of the denunciation; and although this process of reduction had been raised at the instance of the relict and bairns of the deceased, and after they had summoned Arkinglass to underly the law for the slaughter, and obviously with a view to get the better of this defence as to Caddell being at the horn, the justice, in respect of the answer, repelled the defence proponed by the pannel on the horning, declared the same null, and found farder process in the said matter.

The trial of Johnne Campbell of Arkinglass commenced 17th September, 1596;
 see another notice of this case, p. 363.<sup>2</sup>

A remarkable proof of the subsistence of this state of the law among us occurs in certain proceedings in Parliament in the year 1567, which throw considerable light on this point. In consequence of the battle of Corrichie in 1562, where the Earl of Huntly was defeated and lost his life, many of his followers were forfeited by Parliament. When Queen Mary afterwards wished the support of that powerful family, many of these forfeitures were reduced and set aside by Parliament. In the reduction at the instance of two of these Gordons, among the reasons given for setting aside the decree of Parliament, which had been in absence, was this one, "becaus befor the day of compeirence and the tyme of the leding and deduceing of the foirsaid decrete and sentence of foirfaltour, lang of befor and allwa ane gret space thairafter, the saidis persones were dewlie and orderlie demenceit rebellis and put to the horne," for not obtempering the charge to compear and answer super inquirendis, "Quhairby the said persons then wer alluterlie unable, and had na personages to stand in jugement for defence of their just cause, thai being innocent of the crymes laid to thair charge, and thairfor durst not nor myght not compeir to that effect for dainger and feir of thair lyves be reason that thai being for the tyme standand at the horne, and sua it was lauchful to any of the lieges of this realme, thair inymeis and unfreindis, to haif slaine thaim, without ony cryme or remeid of law, to haif followit thairupon."<sup>3</sup>

In this instance the pursuers were at the horn for disobeying a charge in a criminal process ; but it is a remarkable circumstance, that in the same Parliament there is a reduction of the forfeiture of John Earl of Sutherland, which had been pronounced by Parliament also in absence ; and one of the grounds of reduction is, that the Earl was at the horn, using the very same words as expressive of the consequences, to the safety of his life, and the impunity of any of the lieges who might slay him. But the horning was at the instance of the comptroller against the Earl " for non-payment of the thridis of the bischoprick of Caithnes, and as takkisman or ferimorare thairof,"<sup>1</sup> so that he was at the horn for a civil cause ; and yet the same effects are said to attend a horning on such a debt, as for disobeying a charge to underlye the law, that it was lawful for any one, even his private enemy, to have put him to death, without liability to punishment.

These forfeitures, it is true, are reduced in absence of any person on the part of the Crown : the parties had made their peace with the Queen, and the reduction was a mere matter of form ; but it cannot be supposed, that, in a proceeding before Parliament, any statement should be made as to what was law which was not true : indeed, in such a case there was less occasion to allege what was not admitted law, than in a case to be defended.

In the case of Thomas Trumbill and others, for the slaughter of Thomas Ker and his servant,<sup>2</sup> there is a further illustration that this was still admitted law. The pannels objected that they ought not to be put to the knowledge of an assize, because Ker and his servant were rebels at the time for slaughter. The answer is, they were lawfully relaxed before the crime libelled, and this is sustained.

The pannels next object that they ought not to be tried for the murder of Ker, because at the time " he was enterit our Soverane Lordis rebell, and put to the horne, and herewith produced the said horning, usit at the instance of James Mastertoune for non-payment of seven scoir ten li. mony, and xl. li. for expenssis." The advocate does not dispute the effect given in the pannel's plea to this horning for a debt, but objects to the horning for want of registration and subscription of the sheriff-clerk ; in truth, he thus admits the law that horning has the same effect in this highest of all respects, whether it be in a criminal pursuit for slaughter or for non-payment of a debt. The relaxation is held to apply to this horning also, and the trial proceeds.

In like manner, George Trumbill, accused of several slaughters and other crimes, pleads, " as to the slauchter of Walter of Raflat, he was slaine at the horne, and produceit the horning for verifying thereof, raisit at the instance of Andro, Commendator of Jedburcht, quhair (against?) the said Walter for nocht removing fra the landis of Raflatt, dated 20th April, 1581."<sup>3</sup>

The advocate " allegit, that albeit he was at the horne, the pannel aucht nocht to usurpe the Kingis auctorite upounne him, to slay ony man at his awin hand."

This answer, however, was not sustained, and although the horning was twenty-one years before, and in a civil process, as he had never been relaxed, he was out of the protection of the law, " for the justice remittis the hail poyntes of dittay, except the slauchter of umquile Walter Trumbill of Raflatt, to ane assize."

The plea is again urged, in the case of Alexander and Nicoll Bruntfield, " that the defunct for quhais slaunchter thai are persewit, was slane at the horne for four

Macrae v.
Macrae.

But there is a subsequent case which proves the same, and which is the rather noticed, as it led to the enactment of 1612, c. 3, which made the first difference in our law between civil and criminal rebellion; and it is singular enough, that, just a century after the proceeding already noticed in 1512, the same family, Douglas of Drumlanrig, should give occasion to discuss this matter.

On 21st December, 1611, William Douglas, younger of Drumlanrig, is "dilaitit for invading and pursewing of William Kirkpatrick of Kirkmichael on 15th July, 1610;"<sup>2</sup> the prosecutors are the private party and the King's Advocate.

It is allegit na proces at Kirkmichael's instance, because he is rebel (horning on a civil cause is produced). The answer is he is relaxt. It was also alleged that he is at the horne for not-payment of the taxatione.

The Justice, with advice of the Assessouris, finds na proces at the instance of Kirkmichall "sa lang as he stands rebele unrelaxt."

The further proceedings in this curious case are well worthy of attention, but I refer to my authority for the details. The King's Advocate (Sir Thomas Hamilton, afterwards Lord Haddington) upon this declares that he insists for his Majesty's interest. The defence against this also is, that the person taken captive was not the King's free liege, as being rebel by a horning in 1601, and it was therefore no usurpation of the King's authority to invade and detain him prisoner; and it was further pleaded, that "Bannitus potest impune occidi, sic multo fortius capi et incarcerari;" and Baldus and Julius Clarus are cited for this rule of law. The plea of the King's Advocate, who, however, cites no authority for his position, is, that bannitus here is only he who is declared rebel for a capital crime. The panel replies, that "Banniti war alsweill rebells for crymes as for pecuniall wronges." From this it is clear that Kirkmichael was at the horn for a civil cause; indeed it is stated to have been for the taxation.

The Justice continues the case till Tuesday next.

The law clearly was not such as was favourable to the prosecutor; and from the after proceedings in the case, it appears that steps had been taken to procure the agreement of the parties, in order to avoid a decision which would not have been consistent with that improvement and civilisation which the King wished to see introduced among his native subjects.

On 24th December, the pannel appears, and offered to abide his trial, and passed from any objection to Kirkmichael pursuing because he is a rebel. The diet is deserted, as neither Kirkmichael nor my Lord Advocate appeared.

On 24th April, 1612, the cause is brought again before the Court. The Lord Advocate declares he is now to insist. The pannel produces a letter from Kirkmichael, declaring that he had gone to Drumlanrig of his own consent, and had not been detained a prisoner.

The Advocate also produced a letter from the King, directing him to insist for the cause remitted for farther consideration to the Lords of the Secret

* I am indebted for this important illustration of this curious subject to a learned friend (Cosmo Innes, Esq. advocate), who is so conversant with our legal antiquities; and he has further supplied me, from the Privy Council papers, with a copy of a letter of King James on this subject, which bears intrinsic proof of having come from the pen of the royal author himself. I give it here as a curious document, illustrative of the history of our statute law.

The proceedings in this case led to the passing of the act 1612, c. 3, which put an end to the law which was pleaded by Drumlanrig, that a rebel for a civil cause might be slain, and that the slayer was not amenable to the law as a murderer, because the person slain was out of the protection of the law. By this act it is declared, "That if any of his subjects be mutilate or slaine, being at the borne for only civil causes, the slayer being pursued, or sick as are airt or part of the said crimes of slaughter or mutilation before the Justice-General, his depute, or any other ordinar juge; no allegiance founden upon the party slain or mutilate thus being at the horn for any civil cause, shall either stay process or be ane defence to delay process, or procure impunity of the offenders guilty of the crimes foresaid."

I know of no further distinction which was made by statute till escheat was taken away as a consequence of denouncing a burning for a civil cause, by 20th Geo. II. c. 50; so that I do not adopt the opinion that, keeping out of view these two acts of Parliament, there was any difference in the consequences following the contempt of the royal authority, whether that arose from disobeying a charge to underlie the law, or to pay or perform under the decree of a civil court.

II. As to the effect of being at the horn upon the property of the rebel, and the capacity of affecting that property with his debts or deeds.

When any person was convicted of a felony, or, being accused, was fugitive from justice, the natural consequence was, that not being able to vindicate his right to the moveable property belonging to him, it fell to the King as res nullius; while, according to the principles of the feudal law, the superior of whom he held as therefore to be criminallie followed, but at the Judges discretioun to be gentlie punished, whiche being an innovatioun both repugnant to the Imperiall law and to our certane knowledge contrare to the many and daylie practickis of that our Judicioris, will not only make that civil whiche hath always been thought criminall, but lykewyes give occasion to our subiectis at their pleasure with impunity, or at the worst with the assurance of ane gentle punishment, to oppress and imprison our other frise lieges, soe as the kingis peace, and our royall authoritie shalbe no securitie to our subiectis, and that barbaritie, which wee have soe much endeavored ourselve to repes in the Clangregour, shalbe increased in others, But because this presuming to propone ane innnovation in a question de Jure is in all advocattis intollerable: (howsoever the same be permissible to them in controveries de facto), and in respect that the danger of new lawis (whiche in all commonwealthis is iustlie to be feared) did induce the Lacedemonians to ordane the infringers thereof to propone the same with a roape about their neck wherein the author was hanged if his law tryed not expedient for the weill of their estate; It is therfor our speciall pleasure, that vpon sight hereof, yee do certify these and all other advocattis, that wee will not suffer this presumption to be any longer in them unpunished: And in case any of them shall hereafter attempt to propone the like innovatiounis yee shall not neglect to punish them therfor condignelie; wherein your omission, or remissions will not only move vs to anger against yourself, but lykewyes induce vs to intend some severer course for their correction; and thus willing you not to faile in the premissis as yee wold doe vs most acceptable service, wee bid yow fairweill. Disputes, it may easily be supposed, would often arise between these contending interests. In England such are known to have occurred, and to have formed part of the grievances, the redress of which was extorted from the King. Accordingly, among other points, this was settled by the charter of Henry III. in 1216, sect. 23, "Nos non tenebimus terras eorum qui convicti fuerint de feloniam nisi per unum annum et unum diem, et tunc reddantur terræ dominis feudorum."

Macrae v.

The same rule was observed with us, and was also applied to the case of a person not abiding his trial; so that the moveables belonging to the rebel became the property of the King, and, at the expiration of year and day from the outlawry, the superior recovered the lands out of the hands of the King, to hold them during the lifetime of the rebel; the one being termed the single, and the other the liferent escheat.<sup>1</sup>

If the effect of being declared a rebel was that he could not bind himself, or enter into any contract, or do any thing in relation to his property, it might have been expected that this important consequence would have been noticed in the institutes of our law, the more so if the same disabilities applied in cases of civil as of criminal rebellion, and considering the innumerable cases to which this proceeding was applied. Yet nothing of the kind is to be found, but the contrary; so that it will appear that the rebel's acts and deeds are always valid, where they do not affect the interest of the King or the superior, and where he does not require the aid of the King's Courts to enforce them. These are the only limitations. Thus,

1. One denounced may, before expiring of year and day, set tacks for payment of the old duty.<sup>2</sup>

2. A rebel may dispone upon his moveables any time before intenting of the general declarator.<sup>3</sup>

3. A rebel, while affected by the single escheat only, may assign heritable bonds or dispone heritable property, "otherwise horning would be equivalent to an inhibition."<sup>4</sup>

4. A bond granted after denunciation sustained against the escheat, is not voluntary, but in satisfaction and implement of a prior obligation.<sup>5</sup>

5. A rebel may assign a debt owing to him, if the assignee complete his right before the gift.<sup>6</sup>

6. A rebel may warn tenants to remove, he not being year and day at the horn.<sup>7</sup>

7. An obligation to pay during the life of one who is declared a rebel, does not fall under the single escheat, as not being moveable; and when the liferent escheat only affected feudal subjects, it necessarily remained with the rebel; "therefore tenzie thus states the law:—"If the vassal continues year and day rebel, is esteemed civilly dead, and consequently, not being able to serve the r, the law gives the superior the mails and duties of his feu during all the the vassal's life."<sup>4</sup> Stair says, "Liferent escheat carries the profit of all d liferents during the life of the rebel, having remained year and day at the ough thereafter he be relaxed;"<sup>5</sup> and Erskine observes, "Though it is a n expression that heritable rights fall under liferent escheat, it is only the , or the profits arising from those rights during the rebel's life, that are car-that casualty."<sup>6</sup>

James IV., both in his amusements and his tastes, was naive prince, and it would appear that one of the means adopted for supply-coffers were the sums paid for commuting crimes. The records of the try Court during his reign shew to what extent this system was carried; s illustrations from the privy seal record (p. 97)' add much to our informa- this subject. When remissions for crimes could be obtained on such easy there was no occasion to be fugitive from the laws; and even when that ppen, a fine was sometimes imposed instead of sentence of fugitation.<sup>8</sup>

 Macrae v.
 Macrae.

In reference to the act 1535, we may notice that in 1513, at the Justiciary Court held at Wigtonne, we find a person convicted and fined for intercommuning with Thomas M'Clellane,<sup>4</sup> a rebel, and at the horn; and also Patrick M'Clellane of Gilestone, and Andrew and John M'Clellane,<sup>5</sup> &c., denounced rebels for their not entering to underlye the law for the slaughter of Robert Mur.

Patrick had been rehabilitated in 1510, although he had received sentence of death for rief and Stouth.<sup>6</sup>

Thomas M'Clellane of Gylestone, whether the person above mentioned or not is of no moment, having been, in 1535, year and day at the horn for slaughter, the Court of Session, instituted just three years before, seems for the first time to have been called on to enforce "the laws of the realm," at the instance of his superior, claiming the liferent escheat of M'Clellane as his vassal. Because they found these laws "varient in themselves," they referred the interpretation to Parliament, "gif the samine concernes simple slauchter or not, and suld have place in that mater or not." The question seems to have been, whether the superior's right was effectual in the ordinary crime of murder, or of murder under trust, which was formerly punished as treason. The Lords of the Articles decided, as a general rule in all cases, that "the use in times bygane has bene, that the mails and duties of the lands of them that has been year and day at the horne, holden of uther superiours than the King's grace, year and day being bypast, returned againe to the superiours of the saidis landis, for the lyfetime of them that sustained sik process of horning year and day, as said is, except crimes of treason and lese majesty."

Since then, only the profits of the fee, or the mails and duties, go to the superior, the fee must remain in the rebel, only that he cannot make disposition of any thing currente rebellione in prejudice of the superior or his donator, if he happen to remain year and day rebel, no not to any of his lawful creditors."<sup>7</sup> But his powers are limited by the superior's interest alone; and also that he being a rebel, cannot seek the aid of the law, or of the superior, to enforce any deed in his favour, or any disposition by himself; but in other respects he remains proprietor. Hence,

1. Liferent escheat did not originally affect heritable subjects which were not feudal, and which did not hold of the superior, such as a liferent tack, for this was not enacted till 1617, c. 15, and the rebel continued to enjoy it.<sup>8</sup>

2. On the rebel's death, his heir must take the property out of his hæreditas jacens by service, obtaining a dispensation as to his predecessor having died at the peace of the King.<sup>9</sup>

3. His creditors may attach the fee in the person of the rebel, provided they do not affect the superior's right to the profits during his life.<sup>10</sup>

Macrae.

5. A vassal at the horn year and day may resign on a procuratory in the hands of his superior. It is not said to be null as the act of one civilliter mortuus, but was excluded by the said superior's gift, the rebel having been previously base in fact on the precept.<sup>2</sup>

6. An infeftment from a rebel year and day at the horn, is sufficient to support the defence of bona fide percepti et consumpti.<sup>3</sup>

7. As an accessory to the right of levying the rents during the life of the rebel, the superior or his donator may remove tenants, but their title is too temporary to support an action for annulling feus, ob non solutum canonem, "which might be only urged by him who was capable to break the property, as the donator was not."<sup>4</sup>

8. A creditor arresting after year and day, having obtained decrees of furtherance before gift or declarator of liferent escheat, was preferred to the superior's donator because of his diligence.<sup>5</sup>

9. A comprising led against one who was year and day at the horn, and infeftment on it preferable to a subsequent gift of the liferent.<sup>6</sup>

10. A rebel denounced, and remaining year and day at the horn, may acquire lands after that period; and if he does so, and continues still at the horn, unrelaxed for year and day again after such acquisition, these will belong to the superior.<sup>7</sup>

11. A rebel granted a charter to his son, to be holden of his superior, reserving his own liferent. This charter the superior confirmed. This was not held null, but was sustained as sufficient acknowledgment of the superior by the rebel, although the charter in his own favour not having been confirmed, he was in fact not the vassal of the superior.<sup>8</sup>

After so many instances where the rebel's acts and deeds are effectual, or diligence against his lands or moveables as still his property validly executed after his denunciation, it seems quite impossible to maintain, that no act of his can be valid, because he is to be reckoned civilliter mortuus. Indeed, if a rebel were to contract a marriage, surely a son born to him while unrelaxed would be his heir, and would be entitled to succeed on his father's death, as the superior's interest, the only opposing interest, would then have ceased. The pursuer, at least, could not plead the contrary, as he was born on 2d January 1791, and, of course, subsequent to the outlawry of his father, which was on 26th July 1790; and it can make no difference in such a case that the rebel was previously married.

It was said that no instance had been shewn of a disposition or settlement of an estate by a rebel. Perhaps not; but is there any one decision pointed out, in which any contract entered into, deed executed, or conveyance made, is set aside, solely on the ground of having been made by a rebel, or except when it affected the rights acquired under the single and liferent escheat? We have seen that an outlaw in England is capable of making a testament; and Julius Clarus lays it down, that "Bannitus nullo modo efficitur intestabilis, ex quacunque causa sit bannitus."<sup>1</sup> And when we consider the very great number of cases to which this form of procedure came to be applied in the 16th and 17th centuries, indeed every case where the King's letters were disobeyed, and the wholesale manner in which it was often exercised at the instance of the Crown,* of superiors, and of creditors, if such had been the law, as there was no difference so far as the property of the rebel was concerned, from what cause the horning proceeded, it is quite impossible but we should have found abundant traces of it in our law books.† The act 1579, c. 13,<sup>2</sup> complains that the multitude of rebels is so great, that it is difficult to know them from the King's obedient subjects; and 1592, c. 60, commences with stating, that one of the great causes of the present confusion is the multitude at the horn for civil causes. Accordingly, by 1598, c. 3, a Convention of estates appoints the laws to be strictly enforced "for remeid of the universal contempt and rebellion of sic as remaines at the horne, but feir of God or reverence of justice;"<sup>3</sup> and the mode in which this is to be done, as ratified in a subsequent convention of Estates, shews with how little effect previously such sentences had been attended.<sup>4</sup>

In truth, so frequent had escheat become, and so much was it an object for the cupidity of those in power, that gifts of escheat were applied for and obtained when the parties should afterwards be denounced rebels. This was put an end to by 1567, c. 23, and the same frequency introduced the practice of interfering with the process of law, by granting licences and supersederes, "quhilk daily uses to be grantit to sik as be themselves or uther friendes hes credite of his Majesty they

* As one instance, may be noticed that John Forbes of Pitsligo, three sons, and seventy-three others, are all denounced rebels under one indictment, 26th January 1535-6: Pitcairn, vol. i. p. 172.

† In those days the being at the horn never seems to have affected their transactions except with the Crown, the superior, or party at whose instance the horning issued. See the account of a singular contract entered into at Edinburgh between John Napier of Merchiston and the too celebrated Robert Logan of Restalrig, in July 1594, although he had been ordained to be denounced a rebel by the Court of Justiciary on 13th June preceding.—Napier's Life of Napier of Merchiston, p. 220.

I may also refer to a sasine<sup>1</sup> in favour of Andrew Master of Jedburgh, 12th July 1622, of a conveyance by John Home of Swanscheill, "cum consensu et assensu honorabilis viri Joannis Preston de Pennycuick et Joannis Erskine de Balgonie donatoris escheate et vitalis redditus domini Magistri Joannis Home et Margarete Forrester ejus sponse." It was not that the deed of the rebel was null that it was confirmed by the donator; but as it was a conveyance to a disponee, immediately to take effect, the consent of the donator, whose interest it was to affect, became necessary. Preston was probably an adjudger. Home was probably still at the horn unrelaxed; yet the disposition is not null, but received by the disponee, and acted upon both by him and the superior when thus assented to.

These are prohibited in time coming by 1587, c. 47. Part of the revenue of the town of Edinburgh arose from a grant of the escheats, delinquentibus in dicto burgo, et captis ibidem et convictis. This was not held to apply to the escheat where the criminal was fugitive, since it fell, because the man was put to the horn, and not because he committed the slaughter.<sup>1</sup>

Macrae v.

Macrae.

When such was the frequency of this process and the effects were the same whether in civil or criminal process, and when it was competent for a person at the horn to execute so many deeds, and no utter incapacity is ever hinted at, I cannot suppose that it could have been the privilege of an heir, after the interest of the superior is at an end, to object to any conveyance or disposition affecting the property made by a person at the horn, without some trace of such being found in the decisions of our Courts. Prior to 1693, there could be no disposition or change of investiture after the death of the rebel; moreover, the superior was not bound to admit of any change; and as the heir would succeed on the death of the rebel, there was little motive for a rebel to make any new disposition. But if it was made, I cannot see that the heir, who took the estate by service as heir, and of course was liable to fulfil the debts and obligations of his predecessor, could object to it, or disregard it, on the ground that the maker was at the horn at the time.

The change which was introduced by Geo. II. c. 20, abolishing escheat on hornings in civil causes, was the only difference besides that by 1612, ever made by statute as to the effect of hornings, although the influence of an improved state of manners introduced a difference in the practice during the 18th century; and this may be one reason why so salutary a change was not introduced at an earlier period into our law. At the same time, as a proof how seldom any change, even the most obvious improvement, can be made on our legal institutions without the occurrence of some unlooked for inconvenience, I may notice that, however unlikely it was that any such should have arisen from this abolition of escheat, such was soon felt in the case of Fairlie against Earl of Rothes,<sup>2</sup> 1752, Kames, where the question occurred how an obligation ad factum præstandum was now to be enforced, where the defender being a peer, was privileged from caption; the point was not solved in that case, and "the question was delayed through hopes of an accommodation." Since that time, an alternative has been introduced into a summons for implement, which obviates the difficulty which could not there be surmounted.

Upon the whole, then, I am for sustaining the defences in the original process.

With regard to the supplementary process, which calls for reduction of the order of the Court, authorizing registration of the deed of entail, on the ground that the late Mr Macrae being an outlaw, had no right, either by himself, or by granting a mandate to others, to appear for him, to take any privilege or benefit of the law or of the statute 1685, and farther, that such mandate fell by his death on 16th January 1820, I am of opinion, that although Mr Macrae could not appear in Court in his own person to enforce any right or obligation contracted in his own favour, the trustees whom he authorized to execute an entail of his lands (a deed which, in my opinion, he could have executed himself), were entitled to apply to have it recorded; and that their mandate to this effect did not fall by his death, as the implied mandate under which they acted was not for behoof of the mandant, but of the heirs of entail, any one of whom might have applied to have the deed recorded; and, therefore, it did not fall by the death of the mandant.

I am, therefore, for sustaining the defences in the supplementary process also.

LORDS JUSTICE-CLERK and MEADOWBANK.—In answer to the questions submitted by the First Division of the Court in this case, I do not deem it necessary, after having seen the very full and elaborate opinion of Lord Medwyn, to enter at any length into a review of the various topics that have been discussed both in the written and oral pleadings of the parties, but shall content myself with stating, generally, the opinion that I have formed on a deliberate consideration of what has been urged regarding this important question in law.

Upon a review of the authorities and decisions of our law, there do not appear to me sufficient grounds for holding that, in so far as regards the right to and power of disposal of real property, there exists any solid distinction between the effects of outlawry and denunciation in regard to crimes in the Court of Justiciary, and of the procedure which flows from process in the civil Court, by horning and denunciation in regard to civil debts. It is no doubt fixed law, that on failure to appear when duly cited on a criminal charge, a person is declared to be an outlaw and fugitive from his Majesty's laws, and ordained to be put to the horn, yet the proceeding, while it has in practice assumed the form of a sentence, expressly bears only to take place "for his contempt and disobedience in not appearing the said day and place, in the hour of cause, to underlie the law for the crime charged against him." The nature and magnitude of the offence charged, has not the smallest effect upon the procedure, which, proceeding not upon the presumption of guilt, as in England in cases of treason and felony, with us in every case, even of the most insignificant crime, leads to sentence of outlawry against the person accused who has failed to appear, and who is thereby held to be in rebellion against the sovereign and his laws. In like manner, in regard to civil debtors, when charged on letters of horning under the Royal Signet, and failing to obey, they are held also as being in rebellion on account of their disobedience. In point of form the two proceedings are different, but in substance they are in reality the same. Sir George Mackenzie states, that "a person at the horn is by the English law always, and oftentimes in our law, said to be outlawed; and to be outlawed imports the loss of all the privileges of law; and in our law they are said non habere personam standi in judicio; nor puts our law any distinction between civil and criminal cases." And though there follows some reasoning, which may at first sight appear to limit the effect of these last words, yet, on consideration, it will be found rather to amount to the speculative views of the author than to a contrary exposition of the law. For the same author, in his observations on the act of the 12th Parliament of James VI. c. 145, has these words:—"By the last clause of this act, it is provided, that the treasurer or his depute may cause secure the houses of the committers of the crimes upon the expenses of the readiest of the escheat goods, that is like that annotatio bonorum allowed by the civil law in criminis against absents; and though the act specifies only that this may be done in crimes, yet I conceive that all rebellion is comprehended under the word crimes; for in all cases, even for civil rebellion, not only may the treasurer seal till caution be found, but even the Lords of Session, will, upon a bill, allow sealing of the rebel's goods at the donator's instance till caution be found." Macrae v.

Macrae.

A sentence of fugitation or outlawry ordains, that the person outlawed shall be put to the horn, and the denunciation further bears that all his goods and gear shall be escheat for his Majesty's use; and when this sentence is duly recorded, and the outlaw remains unrelaxed for year and day, his liferent escheat also falls, and the right of his superior to enter into possession of his heritable estate undoubtedly takes effect. But this rule of law, according to the authorities, applies to all persons put to the horn and denounced rebels. These are unquestionably serious consequences, resulting from the contumacy exhibited by the outlaw, independently of the other attendants of the sentence of outlawry, on which it is unnecessary to enlarge. But farther than the forfeiture of his liferent escheat, and the known legal interests that in consequence belong to the person entitled to that forfeiture of his vassal or to his donatory, I can discover no express dictum or authority for holding that, according to the law of Scotland, a vassal is further punished in consequence of his outlawry, by being deprived of all powers as to the fee of his heritable estate. It is no doubt true that the person under denunciation of outlawry can execute no deed, or do any act that can injure or impair the interests of his superior or his donatory in his liferent escheat, the exclusive enjoyment of which remains with them; but quoad the fee of what is the subject of that escheat, and upon which the superior or his donatory has no legal claim whatever, the rights of the outlawed vassal remain entire, subject no doubt to the limitation, that he cannot appear in a court of justice to sue or defend regarding it while unrelaxed. It is accordingly clearly established by the cases referred to in the pleadings, that in so far as they do not trench on the rights of superiors or donatories, the acts of the person denounced as rebel are recognised as perfectly legal. He has not forfeited the fee of his estate by the sentence of outlawry. The law has not declared him incapable of disposing or limiting the enjoyment of it after his death—for it seems inconceivable, that if every act of a person after sentence of outlawry and denunciation recorded under it were utterly null and void, it should not have been so stated in some authority or other. Nobody will deny that a person outlawed, though said to have thereby suffered the capitis diminutio, may succeed to an estate which, at his death, will pass to his heir, or that he can enter into a legal marriage, and that a lawful child begotten and born after sentence of outlawry will be entitled to succeed to its father, though it has been the practice to grant a relaxation or dispensation for enabling one in such circumstances to be duly served, in terms of the brieve of mortancestry. It would be a violation of legal principle, however, to hold, that with regard to an estate in which the person outlawed stood invested in fee simple, but of the enjoyment of the rents and profits of which he was merely deprived during his life by the operation of law, from his incapacity to discharge the duties of vassal, he should farther be held debarred from all power of regulating the succession of it after his death. This is a penalty resulting from outlawry which would require either to be established by express statute, or to have been declared to attach to the outlawed person by a series rerum judicatarum of a declarative nature, but of which I have seen no evidence in this case.

Here, enlarging further, and feeling indebted to Lord Medwyn for

No. 21. the laborious researches made by him, I am of opinion that, independently of the specialty that occurred in this case from the late Mr Macrae having granted the disposition of his estate to Mr Alexander Young, prior to the sentence of outlawry pronounced against him in the Court of Justiciary, the entail of the estate of Holmains is not reducible on the ground on which it is rested in the first question put to the consulted Judges, nor on that stated in the second question, as that entail having been executed by trustees was competently recorded on application by them, as it might also have been at the instance of any one having an interest in the succession under it.

Nov. 22, 1836.
Macrae v.
Macrae.

LORD MONCREIFF.—If the deed of entail here sought to be set aside had been the direct act of Mr James Macrae, after the sentence of outlawry and fugitation pronounced against him by the High Court of Justiciary, and after the letters of denunciation on that sentence had been executed, the said sentence never having been recalled, or if that entail must in law be regarded in the same light as if it were his direct act, I should have considerable hesitation in thinking that it ought to be sustained. The question, whether the falling of the liferent escheat, upon denunciation on letters of horning for a civil debt, before the statute 20th Geo. II., had the effect of disabling the party so denounced rebel, from executing any deeds of conveyance of his heritable estate, has been argued at great length in the cases and in the hearing. But, as it does not appear to me that the solution of that question in the negative would be sufficient for determining that a denounced outlaw, by the sentence of the Criminal Court, could effectually execute a deed of entail, I shall only observe on that point, that it does not seem to depend on the supposition of a forfeiture of the fee of the estate as in the person of the rebel, or on the clearest settlement of the reverse. There can be no doubt, that the fee is not forfeited, to such an effect as to preclude the heir from taking it up on the expiry of the liferent, or to allow it to be carried by any gift of the liferent escheat. The proper question is, concerning the powers of the rebel, after denunciation, to perform legal acts affecting the heritage thus fallen for the time into the hands of the superior; and this seems to me to depend, not so much on the point, whether, in the abstract, a party so situated was disabled from executing deeds of conveyance, as on the difficulty of holding that any one except the superior could legally object to them.

But, after giving all the attention in my power to the arguments and authorities laid before the Court, I have not yet been convinced, that there is not, in relation to the present question, an essential difference between the effect of a sentence of outlawry by the Criminal Court, and the effect formerly given to denunciation for a civil debt. Both, no doubt, produced the liferent escheat, whereby the estate falls into the superior's hands during the rebel's life. So far there is a similarity; and it has never been maintained, that there was any forfeiture of the fee to the superior or the crown, such as might follow on an express sentence to that effect on trial and conviction of a crime. The real question is, whether, the estate remaining under the liferent escheat, to be taken up by the heir of investiture on the expiry of it, the party denounced outlaw under sentence of the Circuit Court is legally capable, without recall of the sentence, to do the acts which are implied in the execution of an entail under the statute 1685?

“ From the note in Elchies on Stair, p. 194, and the authorities there referred to, it appears that the forfeiture of the liferent escheat had taken place on denunciation on a criminal sentence of outlawry, long before the same consequence was applied to the case of a party at the horn for a civil debt; and that the act 1535, c. 32, was only passed in order to remove a doubt, still at that time existing, as to the latter case. But, though that act declared the law to be, that the liferent escheat fell in all cases of parties denounced rebels, except for treason and lese majestie, it does not at all follow, that that was the only consequence resulting from completed outlawry by sentence of a criminal court, which stood on the undoubted criminal law, at all events for slaughter, independent of that statute altogether.

Macrae v. Macrae.

The clear doctrine of the law was and is, that a party denounced outlaw on such a sentence is "civilitur mortuus,"—that "amittit legem terræ,"—that there is "a forfeiture of his person in law," &c. Hume, ii. 270, 3d edit. The effect of this is explained to be, that he cannot bear testimony in any court; that he cannot hold an office of trust; that he cannot pursue or defend in any "process, civil or criminal;" that he cannot "claim any personal privilege, or benefit whatsoever of the law."—Ibid. The principle is equally stated by all the authorities, though it is variously expressed.

These are consequences of a very strong and decided nature: they are given only as examples of the effects of the general rule of disability; and it seems to me to be very clear, that some of these at least did not, in all cases, follow on denunciation for civil debt. A passage in Sir George Mackenzie's Criminal Law, vol. ii. Works, p. 225, has been quoted in this cause, as proving that there is no difference. It appears to me very singular that it should be so thought. I humbly think that it is a direct authority to the contrary. The question is stated in the beginning of the paragraph, whether "a person at the horn, or excommunicated, may pursue?" By pursuing, the author clearly means prosecute for a crime in the criminal court; for it is of such pursuits only that he is treating. He says that the point is debatable; and then proceeds to state the reasons for and against the admission of such accusers. In stating what "may be alleged" for the negative, he mentions, that a person at the horn is held to be outlawed, and that outlaws are held "non habere personam standi in judicio;" and he closes this statement of what may be alleged on that side of the argument with the words relied on, "nor puts our law any distinction betwixt civil and criminal causes." I think it very apparent, that these words, even if they were unexplained, and could be taken as expressing Sir George Mackenzie's own opinion, do not at all relate to the sentence of outlawry by the criminal court, on the one hand, or the denunciation on letters of horning for civil debt, on the other; but clearly to the cause, civil or criminal, in which the outlaw attempts to appear as a party. There really can be no doubt that this is the meaning, both from the whole scope of the passage, and from the use of the word causes, which cannot apply to a charge of horning. But, after stating these arguments for the one opinion and the other, Sir George goes on to endeavour to resolve the question. And how is this done? "For reconciling which difficulty, it may be alleged, that there is a distinction betwixt the being outlawed for a criminal or civil cause, and that those who are denounced fugitive upon any criminal account cannot be pursued until they be relaxed, which is incontrovertibly true in our law; seeing if a person be denounced for not finding caution for his appearance to answer the law, he will not be admitted to propound any defence till he be relaxed; but though a person be at the horn for a civil cause, it appears most unreasonable, that, because a person is not able to pay a great sum, for which he is denounced, he shall not therefore be permitted to defend his own innocence against a charge. It seems likewise reasonable that some distinction should

No. 21. be made betwixt a pursuer and defender in this case; for it seems unreasonable; that he who accuses another for a crime should debar him from self-defence, though the debarring him from pursuit be not so unfavourable." And then he quotes a case, Spence and Bannatyne, in which it was actually found by the Court that the pursuer in a criminal pursuit could not by horning for debt debar the accused a defendendo.

Macrae.

It seems to me to be impossible to hold, that Sir George Mackenzie, in this passage, gives an opinion, either in words or in true meaning, that there is no difference between the effects of outlawry on criminal sentence, and that arising from horning for civil debt, or to doubt that he does distinctly say that there is a very important distinction. He does not precisely resolve the case of a person at the horn pursuing for a crime; but, in the very point of disability to pursue or defend, which is the thing he is treating of, he says expressly that there is a distinction between the cases, and gives authority for the assertion.

I do not, however, think it necessary to go at large into the authorities which were cited on this subject. I have thought it proper to explain my view of the passage in Mackenzie, which has appeared to others to be express on the point against that view. But all I mean to say is, that I have not yet been convinced, that there is not an essential difference in principle, between the effect of outlawry by the sentence of the Criminal Court, and that of outlawry, under the former law, for civil debt; or that the rules applicable to the latter will settle the former case.

And, if the facts were such as fairly to raise the question, I should not be prepared to say, that, under the rule as laid down by Baron Hume and the other authorities, an outlaw by such a sentence could effectually execute a deed of entail. The proper form of making a deed of tailzie is by resigning the lands in the superior's hands, for new infeftment to special heirs, and under conditions. According to the ancient principle, that should be done by the vassal appearing in the superior's court: The doing it by procuratory was an indulgence. How could the outlaw perform such an act? How could he state himself as vassal? How could he claim the privilege conferred on 'his Majesty's subjects' by the act 1685? How could he demand registration under it by an application to this Court, or authorize another to do so for him? In a word, I cannot see how a person who is "civilly dead," who has "lost the law of the land," and "can claim no privilege or benefit under it," can be in a capacity to perform the acta legitima which are implied in the making of a deed of entail.

But, notwithstanding the difficulty which I have in adopting the argument of the defender in this view of it, I am of opinion, on the actual facts of the case, that the entail is effectual. I think it a point of extreme importance in the case, that the estate was conveyed by Mr Macrae, by an absolute disposition, on the 8th May 1790, to Mr Alexander Young, before even the execution of the criminal letters against him, and that infeftment followed on the 15th May thereafter. There was nothing in law to prevent the execution of such a deed—supposing all questions with creditors or the superior to be waived or reserved. It was an effectual conveyance to divest Mr Macrae of the estate in form, and to place all the powers of the fee in another person. No doubt, it was understood to be given in trust only for the benefit of Mr Macrae and his family; but it was so entirely out of his own power, that he could never, unless relaxed, have enforced the trust in a court of law. So far as he was concerned, it stood on the honour of the disponees. Holding it on such an understanding, Mr Young, acting on Mr Macrae's personal instructions, but solely by his own powers as in the fee, conveyed it to other trustees; then these trustees executed a declaration of trust, in conformity to Mr Young's deed; and at last, on receiving the mandate of 6th May 1807, executed the deed of entail now in question.

No. 2
Nov. 22, 1
Macrae v.
Macrae.

The question is, on what ground can the pursuer, Mr Macrae's heir-at-law, challenge that deed? He cannot reduce Mr Macrae's disposition to Mr Young: For the grantor was then in the full fee as unlimited proprietor. The pursuer's own title, therefore, can only stand on Mr Young's disposition, and the subsequent declaration of trust by the other parties. But, though Mr Young, and the other trustees by his conveyance, might act under the personal instructions of Mr Macrae, all the acts legitima were done by them, who were under no legal disability; and all flowed from the absolute and unqualified disposition to Mr Young, which was a valid and unchallengeable deed. If Mr Young had never conveyed the estate, and there had been no declaration of trust, the pursuer could only have recovered it as heir of his father after his death, by proving the trust by Mr Young's oath. But what title can the pursuer have to complain of the exercise of the powers of the disponee, according to the reality of the trust, as Mr Young knew it, and must have sworn to it? That Mr Macrae gave his instructions afterwards, and that the trustees, for their own exoneration, took formal mandates, does not appear to me to alter the state of the case. The case would have been the same, if Mr Young had originally had all the necessary instructions for executing an entail, and had at last made it. His trust was more general and absolute. But, by whatever instructions it was carried into execution, and ultimately brought to the creation of the entail, these were but personal movements extraneous to the title; and, if Mr Young in the first instance, and the other trustees afterwards, held it to be their duty to act on them, they had the power and the right to do so, without entitling any party to challenge their acts.

In truth, the only case, in which it is conceivable that the pursuer could be entitled to object to the acts of the trustees, would be the supposable event that they had disregarded the instructions of Mr Macrae, or acted contrary to what they might have admitted in writing or upon oath to be the nature of the trust, under which they held the title of property. But this cannot be said: The pursuer's case is on an assumption of the reverse. And, as the granters of all the deeds of conveyance, up to Mr Macrae himself in his disposition of May 1790, were perfectly in titulo, and under no disability at the dates of them, it is difficult to find any thing like a relevant ground of reduction.

The pursuer lays down the proposition, perfectly true in general and to certain effects, that an estate being held in trust for a party is still in the substance of the right of property his, and under his command. But the question here depends on the form of the title, or the power to make it. As to the substance, Mr Macrae could in May 1790 have given the estate to Mr Young absolutely without any trust, if he had chosen to do so. He did give it absolutely in form, though on an understood trust. The trust has been fulfilled according to his will; and the title created stands on rights, in which there is no inhabilitie in the persons, and no defect in the form of conveyance. The objection is, that it is made according to the values or instructions of Mr Macrae. I am of opinion, that this is not relevant, and that the formality of the writings expressive of such instructions does not alter the substance of the question arising on the title.

2. I am on the whole of opinion, in answer to the question stated,

No. 21. that the deed of entail therein referred to is not liable to reduction, at the instance of the pursuer as heir-at-law of his father Mr James Macrae.

Macrae v.
Macrae.

LORD GLENLEE.—I concur in the foregoing opinion.

LORD COCKBURN.—I concur in the opinion of Lord Moncreiff.

LORD COREHOUSE.—I agree entirely in the conclusion at which Lord Medwyn has arrived. Independently of the light which his researches have thrown on the subject, it appears to me that the question may be decided by a reference to clear and familiar principles. It is settled law, that a sentence of fugitation in the criminal court (except in the case of treason) does not operate as a conviction or attainder; it does not even create a presumption that the fugitive is guilty of the offence of which he is accused. It is the punishment of a different offence altogether, that of disobedience to the King's will in failing to appear for trial. That disobedience is the same, and is visited with the same punishment, however heinous the crime, or however slight the misdemeanour with which the party is charged.

The penal consequences of fugitation, to a certain extent, are clearly defined by statute and usage. The single escheat falls immediately after the sentence is pronounced. The liferent escheat falls when the fugitive has remained for a year and day unrelaxed. It is fixed, by the express authority of all the writers, that the fee of his heritable property is not affected by this sentence; the superior has nothing more than the usufruct, that is, the profits and issues of the fee during the fugitive's life.

The only other penalty consequent on fugitation, as is admitted, is, that the fugitive becomes an outlaw—amittit legem terræ. What the import of this expression is, must be gathered from authority or usage; and here, as in every other case in the administration of penal law, the offender has the benefit of a rigorous construction in his favour.

Now, it is distinctly laid down in all the books, that the outlaw has no longer a persona standi in judicio; that he is incapable of suing or being heard in defence in any court: therefore he can vindicate no right, he can protect himself against no claim by means of judicial proceedings. As he is not recognised in judgment, he is said to be civiliter mortuus, and on that account it has been decided that he can exercise no public function; for example, he cannot officiate as a judge, or serve on a jury, or give testimony as a witness, or act as a magistrate, as a notary, or as tutor. Further than this I see no authority or precedent to show that the penalty extends. The fee of his landed estate, as has been observed, remains in him during his life, and at his death is taken out of his hæreditas jacens by the service of his heir. It is nowhere said that he is incapable of contracting an obligation in favour of others, or of imposing an obligation upon them; or that he is incapable of acquiring an heritable estate during the subsistence of his outlawry, or conveying it by a deed inter vivos or mortis causa, and that either absolutely or under conditions. Indeed there is an express authority, "that the fee of his lands, though the rights of the same supervene to him after sentence, descends to his heir,"<sup>1</sup> under the exception, that if the lands were purchased with moveable funds belonging to him at the date of the sentence, they would go to the Crown as a surrogatum for what the fugitive had fraudulently attempted to withdraw from the single escheat. Indeed it is manifest that no act of his can be effectual to the prejudice of the

The argument on which the pursuer chiefly relies is, that, as the outlaw is said <sup>Nov. 22, Maorne v Macrae.</sup> to be civilliter mortuus, it is implied in that expression that he has lost every privilege of a subject, and therefore, among other privileges, that of disposing of landed property. But it is plain that the import of a general, and that too a metaphorical, term, requires to be defined by statute or usage. If it were to be taken in all the extent of which it admits, and in which it is employed in some systems of jurisprudence, it would infer that the outlaw neither could contract marriage, or have lawful children, or have any right whatever vested in him. But there is no authority that civil death is so construed in the law of Scotland. On the contrary, as has been already stated, he can hold property, he can purchase property, and his son, begotten and born after the sentence of outlawry, can serve nearest and lawful heir to him after his death.

If any of the numerous and important disabilities which the pursuer represents as following a sentence of outlawry, really existed, it is certain that some notice would have been taken of them in the books. But he has not produced, and cannot produce, an authority for any of them, with the exception of those which have been already alluded to; and more particularly, he has produced no authority that an outlaw cannot dispose of his heritable estate. The weight of negative evidence is, in my opinion, of itself conclusive of this question; and if the outlaw, though said to be civilly dead, can contract the most important of all civil contracts, and if he can purchase landed property, and hold it in fee, there is no reason why he should not convey it also.

But, independently of negative evidence, and of the strictness with which all penal laws are construed in favour of the offender, it is thought that there is satisfactory positive authority on the very point now at issue. Without stopping to inquire whether the consequences of denunciation on a charge of horning for a civil debt, are in every respect the same with those which result from a sentence of fugitation in the Criminal Court, it is enough to say, that, in both cases, the person denounced or fugitated (before the change of the law by the Jurisdiction Act) was declared an outlaw, his single and liferent escheat fell in the same manner, and produced the same effects. In both cases he was deprived of a persona standi in judicio, and could neither sue nor defend; in both he was pronounced to have lost the benefit of the law; and in both to be civilliter mortuus.<sup>1</sup>

It has been repeatedly decided in the cases cited by the defenders, that a person denounced on a horning can make an assignation of an heritable subject, if it is not to the prejudice of the fiak.<sup>2</sup> If, therefore, outlawry in a civil case, though the fugitive's escheat has fallen, though he has lost the privilege of the law, though he has no persona standi, though he is civilly dead, does not disable him to dispose of his heritage, what ground is there to infer that the outlaw, by the sentence of the Criminal Court, on whom the same penalties, and no others, are declared to attach, has not the same power? Is the general and metaphorical term, civil death, to be construed in the one case in one sense, and in the other case in a totally different sense, and that without the shadow of authority in the books?

With the benefit of Lord Medwyn's researches, and after careful enquiry, I have not been able to discover that the consequences of a denunciation on a horning are different from those of fugitation in the criminal court, or in any respect less severe, with the exception of the distinctions introduced by express statute, or in one or two instances rendered necessary either from the different forms of procedure in the civil and the criminal courts, or from obvious views of expediency and justice. I do not think that outlawry for failure to implement civil obligations was introduced for the first time by the act 1535, c. 32.<sup>1</sup> The contrary is proved by a passage in the Regiam Majestatem, where it is said, that, if the seller of any property fails to relieve his cautioner, he shall be outlawed forth of all the realm of Scotland wherever he shall be found or apprehended. It was doubted by the Court of Session in 1535 whether the liferent escheat fell either in civil cases, or in any case except slaughter, but on a reference to Parliament, the Lords of the Articles found "that the use in times bygane has bene, that the mailles and dewties of the landes of them that has been zeir and day at the horne, halden of other superiours than the Kingis Grace, zeir and day being by-paste, returned again to the superiours of the saidis landes, for the lifetime of them that sustained sik process of horning zeir and day, as said is, except crimes of treason and lese majestie." However this may be, it is certain that in 1612 the penal consequences of outlawry for debt were as severe as those of outlawry in the criminal court, because it required a statute in that year to prevent the outlaw in the former case from being destroyed as a wild beast with impunity.

Sir George Mackenzie, in a passage quoted in the pleadings, lays it down in general terms, "that our law puts no distinction in this matter between civil and criminal causes," by which it is thought he means outlawry by denunciation for a civil debt, and outlawry by fugitation in the criminal court. But he goes on to mention an exception, the necessity of which is quite apparent. If a person is prosecuted in the criminal court for a crime, and is prevented by the accuser from stating his defence, by a sentence of fugitation pleaded in bar, it is in the power of the criminal court, if they see cause, to repone him against the fugitation de plano, that he may be heard. But if the accused in the criminal court is barred from defending himself by denunciation on a horning, the criminal court have no power to repone him, and he must have letters of relaxation under the signet, either in consequence of paying the debt, or by a judgment of the civil court, before he can be heard. In that view, and considering also that the diets in the criminal court are peremptory, unless this exception to which Sir George Mackenzie alludes were admitted, the outlaw on a horning for debt would be in a much worse situation than the outlaw by a sentence of the Court of Justiciary.

The pursuer has endeavoured to distinguish the consequences of civil and criminal outlawry in various particulars. But, even if he had been successful, it would not, in my apprehension, have been material to the issue as long as he could produce no express authority, that in the one case the outlaw could dispose of his heritable property, and in the other that he could not. But I am of opinion, that, under the exceptions I have already alluded to, his attempt has entirely failed. Thus, he states "that the outlaw" (by which he means one who has been fugitated in a criminal court) "has not, and never had, any persona standi in judicio," and "that such disqualification does not attach to the debtor, and never did." By debtor he means one denounced on a charge of horning. So far is this from being the case, that it is stated by Stair, Erskine, and Bankton,<sup>1</sup> in various decisions, and indeed by the concurrence of all the authorities, that one denounced on a horn-ing has no persona standi any more than the fugitive by sentence. The pursuer refers to the case of Chalmers, where a person who had imprisoned a debtor who was at the horn was obliged either to liberate him or aliment him. If it had not been so found the prisoner must have perished, because there was no other fund from which he could be alimented. If he had been outlawed by the criminal court, he would have been alimented at the public expense. The pursuer next says, that a person fugitated cannot be a witness, but that a person at the horn may. Unfortunately he refers to Erskine, who cites a case where the person admitted as a witness was at the horn, not for debt, but by denunciation on letters of inter-communing upon account of conventicles;<sup>2</sup> a crime so heinous at that period that the accused were by special statute deprived of the privilege of all other criminals, being prohibited to take the advice of counsel even in private. Then he says, that an outlaw is incapable of holding a feu, while a rebel at the horn may. For the first proposition there is no authority at all. On the contrary, the reverse is laid down in the books:—"Persons under a civil rebellion, by being at the horn, or for not appearing in a criminal process, are under no disability as to acquiring heritance."<sup>3</sup> A fugitive in the criminal court cannot be admitted to bail until he is relaxed, because the punishment of outlawry has been inflicted on the very ground that he has fled from justice, after being cited to appear. To say, as the pursuer does, that the outlaw forfeits all the rights and privileges of a British subject, while the debtor at the horn retains every privilege, with the exception that he may be deprived of his personal liberty, is an assertion in the face of every authority. It has been decided that the outlaw for debt can neither be judge, juryman, nor tutor, or exercise any other public office more than the outlaw for a crime.<sup>4</sup>

Since, therefore, it is settled law, that the outlaw for debt can dispose of his heritable property, it appears to me to follow, by the plainest analogy, that the outlaw for a crime has the same privilege.

It has been said, that the proper way of executing a tailzie is, by the vassal resigning in the hands of his superior, and that the outlaw cannot resign. I see no reason nor authority for holding that the outlaw cannot resign if the superior chooses to accept his resignation. If he does not think fit to resign in person, he may do so by means of a procurator, which has been the established form of the ceremony for centuries; or lastly, he may grant a bond or obligation of tailzie which the person in whose favour it is granted, can render effectual by the common modes of procedure.

I agree entirely in that part of Lord Moncreiff's opinion, in which he holds the entail in this case to be effectual, on the ground that the estate was conveyed by the late Mr. Macrae to Mr. Young, not only before his outlawry, but before the execution of the criminal letters against him. I have nothing to add to what his Lordship has said upon the subject.

Macrae v.
Macrae.

The cause was again resumed by their Lordships of the First Division.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The whole consulted judges have arrived at one result, though they vary in some respects as to the grounds of their opinion. Independently of the more general question raised in this cause, there is a strong specialty in favour of the defenders, which has led me to modify the view I formerly took of this case. I allude to the circumstance, that the late James Macrae, before being even cited under the criminal letters, executed an ex facie absolute disposition in favour of Alexander Young, W.S., who was immediately infest. That being done, and all the subsequent acta legitima, which are necessary to the success of the defence, being referable back to this unchallengeable disposition, I do not feel warranted in sustaining the reasons of reduction. It is true that after Macrae's outlawry he never could have appeared in Court to complain of any breach of trust which Young might have committed under the powers which were conferred on him by the ex facie absolute disposition. But no question of that sort occurred. The question is not whether the deed of entail is reducible, as being contrary to the trust, held by Young and his disponees, but, whether it is reducible on account of its conformity to the desire of Macrae the truster. On that question, I think there is strong ground taken by the defenders; and I incline to sustain the entail. On the other point in the case, which involves the general question, whether a sentence of fugitation and outlawry in a criminal court, followed by denunciation at the horn, incapacitates a man from subsequently performing any deed whatever which shall be valid in law, I incline to hold the same opinion which I formerly did, especially in so far as regards any application made in Court, by the outlaw, or any mandatory of his.

LORD BALGRAY.—I agree in the opinions of Lord Corehouse and Lord Medwyn. I think there is no difference between the effects resulting from a charge of horning, following on a sentence of fugitation and outlawry, and a charge of horning on a civil decree, always excepting those limited and special differences which have been introduced by statute. The sentence of outlawry does not imply conviction of the crime of which the outlaw had been accused. No forfeiture of the fee of any heritage followed on it. The penal consequences were of a well-known and well-defined character, and we cannot enlarge them without the clearest precedent or practice for doing so. Without such a warrant, we are not entitled to aggravate the penalties of outlawry. I am further influenced in this opinion by finding, after some enquiry into the law of England, that, in those cases in which that law is parallel to our own in not holding the sentence of outlawry to be equivalent to conviction, the only penal consequences are, like ours, the single and the liferent escheat. The jus testamenti-factionis is not taken away, and I think it remains here too.*

* A more detailed opinion of Lord Balgray, with which the Reporters are to be favoured by his Lordship, will be given in an Appendix to this volume.

LORD GILLIES.—I formerly felt that this cause was attended with much doubt and difficulty. But after the very full discussion which we have had, and after considering the opinions which have been delivered, my doubts are removed. I am satisfied that there is no material distinction between the denunciation of rebellion, following on a sentence of outlawry in a criminal court, and the denunciation of rebellion, following on a decree in a civil court. On this point I concur with those Judges who have expressed that opinion. But in regard to the specialty which has been now referred to by your Lordship, and adopted by some of the other Judges, for whose opinions also I feel a high respect, I own that I entertain much doubt. I allude to the circumstance that there was an ex facie absolute disposition executed by Macrae, in favour of Alexander Young, W.S., before he was outlawed, or even cited under the criminal letters. That disposition, whatever it might be, in form, was, in substance and reality, a trust for behoof of Macrae; Young was merely Macrae's trustee; and as to every deed done by him in furtherance of the trust, and to fulfil the wishes of the truster, I think the maxim applies, qui facit per alium, facit per se. If these were deeds which Macrae was incapacitated from executing directly, I do not think they became valid, because of his using the agency of a trustee to execute them. The deed was in substance the deed of Macrae as much in the one case, as in the other; and therefore, if I continued to be of opinion that Macrae was incapacitated, by outlawry, from executing the deed of entail, I should think that the entail was equally liable to challenge, if executed by his trustee, acting under his direction. Such, at least, is the leaning of my opinion on that point, but it is not necessary to give an express judgment upon it, in disposing of this cause.

LORD MACKENZIE.—The opinion of Lord Corehouse is precisely mine, except in so far as his Lordship adopts that part of the opinion of Lord Moncreiff which holds the entail valid in consequence of the ex facie absolute disposition by Macrae to Young, before his outlawry. On that point I concur in what has fallen from Lord Gillies just now, and I should hold it would be something very strong indeed to give effect to an opposite doctrine. For, if Macrae had been incapacitated, by outlawry, from executing a deed of entail, the trustee, Young, would thereby just have been rendered the holder of the estate in trust for the heir-at-law of Macrae, till after Macrae's natural death. And as Macrae, ex hypothesi, would be deprived of all power whatever to direct or govern Young's proceedings, Young would have no right to execute this entail, unless it could be maintained that he had an absolute right, proprio motu, to execute any deed affecting the estate, or even to sell it if he chose. It is true, that Macrae, by outlawry, was disabled from complaining judicially of any act of Young, whether contrary to the nature of his trust or not. But Young's right was nevertheless a mere trust right; and if the whole powers of Macrae, the truster, were destroyed, it would seem to follow, not that Young might execute either an entail or any other deed affecting the estate to the prejudice of the heir of the truster, but that he should hold the estate in trust for that heir, in the same state in which it stood, when the incapacity of Macrae took effect upon him. It is unnecessary, however, to give any express judgment on this point.

THE COURT, in both actions, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Sustain the defences, absolve the defenders from the whole conclusions of the libel, and find no expenses due to either party."

John Beattie of Chappelhill died in 1809, having possessed the estate above three years upon apparency.

In 1810, Beattie, the joiner, for a price of £100, sold and assigned to Robert Carlyle, merchant, “and his heirs, secluding subtenants and assignees, legal and voluntary, without the consent of the proprietor, all and whole a tack or lease," being that which was above set forth: The No. 2 assignation also conveyed right to another lease of twenty-one years, between the same parties, including about six acres of ground and some Nov. 22, 1 houses, called Viewfield, at a rent of £9: Kennedy Carlyle.

The assignation purported to be with consent of the tutors and curators of William Beattie of Chappelhill. It was not, however, signed by any of them. Carlyle entered into possession of the subjects. The title of William Beattie was, after some litigation, reduced by Ninian Little, in 1812, who took up the estate and entered himself as heir to the predecessor of John Beattie of Chappelhill.

The subjects thus acquired by Carlyle, besides the field, consisted of two small parcels of ground, separated from each other about fifteen feet, and running back in a direction nearly parallel to each other, from a turnpike road. The stripe of ground interjected between them was occupied by one of Little's tenants, and a similar stripe was interjected between the eastmost of Carlyle's two pieces of ground and the field occupied by him, which stripe was also in the occupation of Little's tenants. On the west of all, lay the ground of Little.

At Whitsunday 1814 a change of possession took place, by which the two narrow stripes of ground intervening between the different subjects occupied by Carlyle, were taken possession of by Carlyle and his tenants; and a portion at one end of the ground hitherto occupied by Carlyle, was taken possession of by Little and his tenants. These respective portions contained each a house and garden, and were of nearly equivalent value. From that time downwards Little continued to let and to draw rent from the subjects to which he thus entered into possession, and Carlyle continued to let and to draw rent from the subjects to which he had entered. He soon afterwards erected a house, thereby completing a row of houses fronting the turnpike road. This row and the adjoining garden ground, included the subjects to which he had entered in 1814, and he now put a slate roof on all the houses in the row, besides making other alterations, especially on the fences, which were adapted to the new state of possession. The change of possession, and these subsequent proceedings, were in the full knowledge of both Little and Carlyle, though the whole subjects were in the actual occupation only of the tenants of each.

On 24th September, 1813, Carlyle had paid to Little four and a half years' rents which were then in arrear, including part which was due by his cedent Beattie, the joiner. Little entered these payments in his cash book, and he made this separate written memorandum:—"Mr Carlyle's lease of Wallacehall commenced at Whitsunday 1814, at £10, 10s. per annum for sixteen years—of the grounds and house 93 years—and 20 years of his new house, after Whitsunday 1814." Little also executed subsequently another written memorandum in the same terms. In 1815, Little received rent from Carlyle of the same amount, and with these memoranda. In 1816, Little addressed a holo-

No. 22. graph letter to Carlyle:—"In the mean time, I hereby confirm your agreement with the late John Beattie of Chappelhill, with regard to the said possession (Wallacehall), in case your proposal should not be eventually accepted of. I remain," &c.

iv. 22, 1836.
Kennedy v.
Carlyle.

In 1828, Thomas Kennedy bought the estate of Chappelhill from Little, and entered into possession, inter alia, of those portions of ground and the house which Carlyle had ceded in 1814, and which Little had ever since possessed. In 1829, Carlyle paid rent to Kennedy at the same rate as he had done to Little, and in conformity with the terms in Little's memoranda already quoted. The twenty-one years' lease of the field under the tack of Wallacehall then came to an end, and the possession of the field was given up, but a dispute arose between Kennedy and Carlyle as to their respective rights in the rest of the subjects, Carlyle contending that he was entitled to occupy them for the remainder of 99 years from 1808, and also to subset them, and Kennedy, on the other hand, contending that he was instantly bound to remove from the whole, and was at all events debarred from subsetting. Kennedy raised a declarator against Carlyle and his subtenants to have it found that they occupied without any legal right or title, and concluding for decree of removing.

A proof was led which established the facts already stated, and in which Little, after being discharged of all claim of relief by Carlyle, was examined by him as a witness. He narrated the facts relative to the state of possession and drawing the rents of the respective subjects from 1813 downwards, and stated that Carlyle since then had always paid £10, 10s. per annum of rent "for his whole possession at Wallacefield as altered." Excerpts from Little's cash-book also proved the rents as thus stated. From the agent of Kennedy, as a haver, the following document, purporting to be a copy of a missive by Little to Carlyle was also recovered. "24th September, 1813.—Mr Carlyle having left the rent of Wallacehall entirely to myself, I hereby agree to let to him at ten guineas a-year, commencing at Whitsunday 1813, during the currency of the leases signed by the late John Beattie, Esq. of Chappelhill, the rents to be paid at two terms in the year, viz. Whitsunday and Martinmas, the first half year's rent to be paid at Martinmas next."

In these circumstances, Kennedy pleaded, 1. The original lease was granted by John Beattie of Chappelhill, who was never infeft, and had no power to grant it, so as to make the right good against a purchaser. 2. Even supposing that Little's letter of 1816 were held to apply to the assignation to Carlyle, and to confirm it, still Carlyle had no right to occupy by subtenants without the landlord's consent, and they must all be removed. The tolerance, by Little, of such subsets from year to year, did not amount to a surrender of his right to challenge a subset at any new term when he pleased, and still less could it affect a singular successor. 3. In 1814 the original lease had been in substance abandoned and renounced by Carlyle, as sufficiently appeared from the change in the possession, and the change in the rent; and he had failed to acquire any valid written title in place of the old one. And even if that lease subsisted to any effect, still the possession of Carlyle, so far as acquired in 1814, was not held in virtue of any written title, as it was not comprehended in the original lease, and no contract of excambion between him and Little was either admitted or competently proved. Such agreement could only be proved by writ or oath of party,<sup>1</sup> and though the facts and circumstances on which a plea of rei interventus might be founded, could be proved by parole, yet these were of no avail unless the contract of excambion itself was first proved by competent evidence.

The defenders answered, 1. John Beattie of Chappelhill possessed above three years, on apparency, and Little took up the estate by service to his predecessor. Little had also by his letter of 1816 expressly confirmed the assignation to Carlyle. He was therefore bound by the lease as effectually as the grantor of it. 2. With the full knowledge of Little, the subjects had always been occupied by subtenants of Carlyle, which amounted to a waiver of the clause excluding subtenants without the landlord's consent. But, at any rate, that clause merely applied to the field, or agricultural portion of the lease, which was let for twenty-one years only, and was never meant to apply to the houses and yards, when the eventual prolongation of the lease as to them for 99 years was to take effect. 3. The right under the original lease had never been renounced or abandoned. And there was written evidence, in the memoranda made by Little, relative to the possession of Carlyle as at 1814, and to the alteration then made, which, together with the rents subsequently paid, and the actual change of possession, and the alteration of the fences, both by Little and Carlyle, amounted to evidence of the alleged excambion; connected as these writings were with the previous lease and assignation, and followed as they had been by so strong a rei interventus, Carlyle was entitled, especially considering the smallness of the subjects, to maintain that his written title, modified by the excambion, embraced his whole possession, and would endure for 99 years from 1808, even when challenged by Little's singular successor. And, in any event, if Carlyle could be compelled to give up any part of his present possession, he must be allowed to reacquire possession of the subject ceded in 1814.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced findings in reference to the delineations and plan in process, and found that Carlyle had established a right as tenant to that part of the subjects to which he had entered under the agreement in 1814, "and that for the space of 99 years from Whitmonday 1808, at the rent specified by him in the record, and to that effect

Carlyle.

Kennedy reclaimed in so far as the interlocutor had found that Carlyle had established a right as tenant to any part of the ground in question, and Carlyle reclaimed in so far as he had been found to have no right to subset.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The writings founded on in this case, though not expressing a contract of excambion, yet necessarily imply it, and, taken in connexion with the real evidence of the facts and circumstances, I hold that the excambion is sufficiently proved. Indeed when I consider the smallness of the subjects which were excambied, for the obvious mutual accommodation of both parties, and all that followed on the excambion, it would be a very serious case if it could now be set aside. The rigorous application of the law in that manner would be highly injurious to many cottars and small tenants throughout the country. In regard to the right of subset, it is no doubt very unusual to insert such a clause in a * NOTE.—There is satisfactory written evidence of the lease granted by Beattie, the proprietor of Chappelhill, to John Beattie, the joiner, and of the assignment of that lease by Beattie, the joiner, to the defender, Robert Carlyle. There is also written evidence of the assignment being confirmed by Ninian Little, who succeeded to Chappelhill, in his letter produced, of the 15th June, 1814. Little, in that letter, calls it the agreement with John Beattie of Chappelhill, not with John Beattie, the joiner; but it is so termed correctly enough, because the assignment would not have been effectual (assignees being excluded) unless the landlord had agreed to it. There is no evidence that the original lease had been surrendered, and an entirely new transaction entered into, as the pursuer tends, for the letter of 24th September, 1813, is plainly a confirmation of Beattie's lease, as assigned to the defender, Robert Carlyle, with the deduction of a shilling or two from the rent, and it strongly supports the defender's pleas. Little's memoranda as to Carlyle's possession at Wallacehall (Proof, p. 27), are also material written evidence to the same effect, and likewise the excerpts from his book (pp. 28 and 29).

"The only difficulty in the case arises from the excambion; but the Lord Ordinary thinks that the defender's averment on this point also is sufficiently established, for it is proved by the most conclusive evidence, and particularly by the testimony of Ninian Little himself, the proprietor at the time, that at Whitsunday 1814 he ceded possession of Graham's house and garden, and some additional ground to the east, to Carlyle; and, on the other hand, that Carlyle ceded to him Beattie's workshop, and the ground marked on the plan 'Garden ground belonging to Kennedy.' And it is proved, that possession has been maintained accordingly since, under the eye, and with the consent of Mr Little, while he remained proprietor. It is thought that this is sufficient real evidence of an excambion between the landlord and a tenant, more particularly in a case of subjects so inconsiderable as those in question."

enduring for 99 years, especially when restricted to such subjects as houses and adjoining gardens, but the parties to a contract of lease may agree to what they please, in this respect; and it appears to me, that, by the terms of this lease, the exclusion does apply throughout the whole course of it.

Farish v.
Magistrate
Annan.

LORD GILLIES.—In proving the contract of excambion, writings or memoranda, even the most informal, may be referred to. And when I consider the writings here produced, and the relative facts and circumstances which have been competently proved by parole, I think the contract of excambion, followed by a rei interventus, has been sufficiently proved. As to the reason for inserting an exclusion of assignees and subtenants, in a lease of these subjects for 99 years, I do not know what it may be. But the clause stands in the contract, and it must receive legal effect.

LORDS BALGONY and MACKENZIE concurred.

THE COURT adhered on both notes, and remitted to the Lord Ordinary to proceed farther; reserving expenses.

Public Officer—Burgh Royal—Town Clerk.—A town-clerk having been appointed for five years, and the council at the end of that period having elected another person, found, in a suspension and interdict, that he was not summarily removable, and the council interdicted from carrying the new appointment into effect, without prejudice to any declarator the council might be advised to institute for having it found that the office came to end by the lapse of the stipulated period.

THE office of town-clerk of the royal burgh of Annan having become vacant in 1829 by the death of the then clerk, Richard Graham, who had for many years discharged the duties of the office by his deputy, John Foot, the magistrates and council, on the 16th of April of that year, “considering that it would be for the advantage to the burgh to elect two clerks,” appointed Foot and the suspender Farish, “to be conjunct town-clerks for the space of five years” from the date of appointment, the emoluments to be divided between them in the proportion of two-thirds to Foot and one-third to Farish. On the 4th of April, 1834, in anticipation of the expiry of the five years mentioned in the minute of appointment, the then magistrates and council, who had been in the preceding November elected by the inhabitants under the provisions of the Municipal Reform Act, “appointed a meeting to be held in the town-house on Friday the 4th instant, for the purpose of electing a town-clerk or town-clerks.” At the meeting so held the following proceedings took place, as recorded in the minutes:—“The provost stated that this meeting had been called for the purpose of electing a town-clerk, or town-clerks, in terms of the resolution of the council of the 4th current. He then moved, that the council do immediately proceed to elect two town-clerks, which motion was seconded by Mr Robert

No. 23. Dickson, whereupon Mr Farish, one of the present town-clerks, protested in the terms stated in a paper apart, authenticated by the initials of the provost. The motion was put to the vote and carried unanimously. Bailie Richardson then moved that Mr John Foot, the present senior town-clerk, be elected senior town-clerk for the period from the 16th of April current, until the day of the annual election of the magistrates and other office bearers in November 1835, with the same share of salary and emoluments of office which was provided for him by the minute of his election in April 1829. This motion was seconded by James Little, and carried unanimously. Bailie Forrest then moved that Mr George Underwood, writer in Annan, be elected junior town-clerk for the same period as is before specified in reference to Mr Foot, with the same share of the salary and emoluments of office which was provided to Mr Farish by the minute of election of April 1829. This motion was seconded by Mr James Little. Mr Blacklock moved as an amendment, that Mr John Farish, the present junior town-clerk, be elected junior town-clerk for the period above specified as in reference to Mr Foot, and with the same share of the salary and emoluments of office which he enjoys at present under the minute of April 1829; which amendment was seconded by Mr Weild. The amendment was then put to the vote, when Messrs Pool, Nicholson, Blacklock, and Weild, voted for it; and Messrs Little, Sawyer, Thom, Baxter, Dickson, McLe Montgomery, B. Nelson, Richardson, and the provost, against it; thus negating it by a majority of eleven to four. The motion was then put and carried by the same majority, and Mr George Underwood was elected junior clerk accordingly, for the period and on the terms specified in the motion."

The protest mentioned in this minute, as taken by Farish, was in these terms:—"Whereupon Mr Farish, on behalf of himself, and without meaning any disrespect to the provost, magistrates, and council, solely from a regard to his own rights and the rights of his successors in office, represented that it was ultra vires of the council to remove the present clerks from office, or to elect others in their place, as had been established by repeated decisions of the Supreme Court, and particularly in the case of Simpson v. Tod and others, 17th June, 1824, the report of which is contained in the third volume of Shaw and Dunlop's Cases, 150-1-2. Mr Farish then read to the meeting, and protested for himself against all and any proceedings to which the council might either now or hereafter have recourse, with a view to deprive him of his office, and that he would hold the Magistrates and council liable to him in damages and expenses if such illegal proceedings should take place; and, lastly, Mr Farish respectfully declined writing any minute of deprivation or election for the reasons above stated, and others to be hereafter condescended to. Following up this protest, Farish immediately presented a bill of interdict and inhibition against the magistrates and council carrying the minute into execution, or interfering with him in the exercise of actions of town-clerk. The bill having been passed and letters expedé, No. 23.

 'which contended—

The office of town-clerk is a public office, involving functions the independent exercise of which is of great importance to the lieges, and the policy of our law has always been to hold that the appointment to such offices must necessarily be ad vitam aut culpam, and to disregard, as infirm and incompetent, any attempted qualification or condition contrary to this principle. Accordingly in the case of Simpson v. Tod,<sup>1</sup> where the question was very deliberately considered, the Court refused to allow a town-clerk expressly appointed "during pleasure" to be summarily removed by the council without order of law, and although a question was there raised as to whether the resolution of removal was regularly made by a proper quorum of the council, the Court did not rest on that ground, but, on the contrary, recalled a finding of the Lord Ordinary founded upon it. There are also other analogous cases supporting the same rule<sup>2</sup> which is not based on any supposed construction of the terms of the appointment, but on a general principle as to the nature of such offices, which will not allow effect to such conditions as were here subjected to the appointment, and at all events precludes its being brought to an end without legal process on the part of those attempting to effect that object. Then as to the new provision in the 3 and 4 Will. IV. c. 76, allowing clerks to be appointed from year to year, it necessarily proceeds on the assumption that previously such an appointment would not have been legal.

Nov. 22, 183
Farish v.
Magistrates of Annan.

On the other hand it was pleaded for the magistrates—

There is no sufficient authority for laying it down as an absolute rule in the law of Scotland that appointments to public offices, such as this in question, must be ad vitam aut culpam, and the provision in the late statute is strongly against the assumption of such a rule, based, as it is alleged to be, on grounds of public policy, since it cannot well be presumed that this provision would have been introduced into the new act had the legislature so esteemed it. In the case of Simpson v. Tod there was a specialty arising from the resolution of removal not having been adopted at a regular meeting when a proper quorum was present, and the decision there, and in other cases referred to, proceeded on a construction of an appointment "during pleasure" that it was not to be held during caprice, but during reasonable pleasure,<sup>3</sup> and that therefore, in order to bring it to an end, a legal process was necessary to show that there were grounds of removal consistent with that construction. Here, however, the appointment is for a time certain, the mere lapse of which requiring no process of law to establish it, clearly brought the officeship to a close, so that here there could be no occasion for the magistrates and council having recourse to legal proceedings, while such a course was incumbent on Farish, if he chose to attempt to make out that he was entitled to hold the office in the face of the express terms of his appointment. Besides, even supposing the appointment illegal, he having accepted it could not quarrel it, and if he could, the result would be, not to get rid of the qualification, but to cut down the election altogether as contrary to law.

* “ The Lord Ordinary is clearly of opinion that there is no material difference, in regard to a possessory question of this kind, between an appointment of a clerk nominally for one year, or for five years, or during pleasure. If there be any distinction, the power of arbitrary removal is clearest in the last case. But still the principle of law, indicated throughout all our books, that a town-clerk of a royal burgh, as a public officer, holds generally his office for life, and that it must lie with those who think that there is an arbitrary power of removing him in any particular case, to show this in a proper process of declarator, was very fully established in the case of Simpson, referred to in the interlocutor. It is said that that decision is of little weight, and the respondents endeavour to explain it away. The Lord Ordinary does not know why it should be of little weight, being the judgment of the Supreme Court in a matter of pure Scotch law. It was very carefully considered. The Lord Ordinary knew it well at the time, and has minutely examined the papers in it, and there is this very marked point involved in the judgment in the advocacy (which is what the Lord Ordinary holds to bind him), that it was pronounced in the question of possession purely, waiving entirely the merits of the reduction and declarator, brought, not by the magistrates, but by Simpson, with a view to a claim of damages, although the terms of the judgment in that declarator, pronounced some time after, are also exceedingly material in the present cause.

“ Having this opinion on the state of the question as presented in the suspension, the Lord Ordinary does not think that it is necessary to enter into the general argument as to the power of the magistrates to remove the suspender. He has understood it to be clear law in general, that a town-clerk of a royal burgh is not a mere servant of the town council, but a public officer, having very important duties to the community, and even to the state, to discharge, in which he must hold himself as entirely independent of the town council. In consequence of this, the general law is, that it is a life office. Accordingly, it did not fall, whatever were the terms of the appointment, even by the disfranchisement of the corporation of the burgh, under the old rules. The respondents have argued in this case, that because the term of the appointment was limited to five years, the office ceased, ipso facto, when the period expired, and a new appointment became essential. But, if this were sound, the consequence would be very serious ; for if the council had dismissed the suspender, and appointed no clerk in his place, it would follow that the burgh might have ceased to have a clerk altogether, and the public franchises of the people, as well as the most important interests of the Crown, the corporation, and the burghage heritors, have been defeated, or essentially impaired. The Lord Ordinary thinks, that, from the nature of the office, it could not expire, ipso facto, under any terms of the appointment, which raises at once the peculiarity in principle whereby the possessory question seems to him to be ruled.

“ The Lord Ordinary has also one observation to make on the statute of 3d and 4th Will. IV. c. 77. It seems to him, that the twenty-sixth section of that act distinctly recognises the previously understood law of Scotland on this point. It provides ‘ that it shall be lawful for the magistrates and council of any such burgh or town to elect a town-clerk, for such burgh or town, for one year.’ Why make

magistrates and council reclaimed.

D GLENLEE.—The question is, if the appointment be of such a nature as entitled the magistrates to turn out the suspender, and all that is decided they must proceed by process of law, and we would need, before we could his interlocutor, to hold it perfectly clear that the appointment came to an entire lapse of the five years. So far from that, however, being the case, contrary to all our impressions, and to the decisions, which establish the fact such an officer cannot be turned out without a declarator and legal process. The Municipal Reform Act does not affect the question, as it only legalizes it for a year in future when there is really and truly a vacancy, and it is impossible to say that it is so plain that there was here eo ipso a vacancy by lapse as to recal the interdict, and therefore I am for adhering.

D MEADOWBANK.—I am entirely of the same opinion.

D MEDWYN.—When I first read the case, I thought there was something singular in a party accepting a qualified appointment and then attempting to convert it into an unqualified one. But looking more into it, and revision that it shall be lawful so to do, if it had not been well known that previous law held a principle opposed to the legality of such a limitation? At with such a provision in the statute book, it must be difficult to say that was no previous law on the subject, or that the case of Simpson was of no use. But the clause goes on more materially to touch this possessory question. 'Without prejudice to his re-election, and also without prejudice to the right of any existing town-clerk in any such burgh or town, to hold his office of town-clerk, or clerk to the magistrates and council, ad vitam aut culpam.' Lord Ordinary does not say that this determines that, in any particular case, a clerk must hold his office ad vitam aut culpam. But it most manifestly supposes that there may be cases in which, notwithstanding an appointment for one

No. 23. seeing that this is merely a possessory question, I think, hoc statu, it is not clear as to entitle the magistrates to appoint another. In Tod's case, though appointment was during pleasure, I cannot think it very different from this, and if that case can only be got rid of by holding that "during pleasure" is not "during pleasure," I do not think it can be got over. It seems to me to rest on the nature of the office. The town-clerk is not the servant of the magistrates, but an officer of the town analogous to that of sheriff-clerk, and at present I incline to hold that adjunction of any condition is illegal, and that this cannot be distinguished from the case of Tod.

Nov. 22, 1836.
Stewart v.
Stewart.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I do not wish to anticipate any thing in the declaration but we have solid grounds in the case of Tod and Simpson, and other cases, in viewing the suspender as holding a public office from which he cannot be arbitrarily removed, and that he is not to be turned out without process at law. I do not see the difference attempted to be made out between an appointment during pleasure and for a limited term, and, therefore, I am for maintaining the suspender in possession, leaving the magistrates to bring their declarator.

disension are brought into the calculation, the reality of her lesion is at the least doubtful.

" The exact nature and extent of her ignorance is equally uncertain. That she did not know the whole law of her case, or cases, is probably true,—as it is of most parties. But the certainty and the degree of her ignorance is by no means clear. Her evidence of it consists entirely of letters which passed between her and her agent ; but it is proved that she had personal interviews with him ; and the points on which she now says that she was in the dark, were ones on which it is very improbable that no communication then passed between them. Accordingly, she herself acknowledges in several letters that she always meant to make a sacrifice, and on grounds which show that she knew more of her true legal position than is now admitted. For example, one of the principal averments on which this action rests is, that, in sharing the property with her brother and sister-in-law, she was not aware that the law of Scotland gave her more than a third, or rather than a fiferent of the third. Yet in her important letter of the 29th December, 1831, to her sister-in-law, in which she explains what her inducements to enter into the contract had been, she says, 'I was quite aware that if I had recourse to a law-suit the whole would probably be mine.' There are other letters with similar avowals.

" But assuming both injury and ignorance ; she was confessedly misled solely by her own professional adviser ; a gentleman against whose intelligence or character nothing is said. It is alleged that he was also the agent of the opposite parties. But this was known to her, and it is not averred on the record that he betrayed the one client to the other ; nor is there in any other respect the slightest fraud imputed to him. He honestly thought it best for her that she should enter into this arrangement, and she took his advice. She wrote to him, saying she thought the bargain better for her brother and sister-in-law than for her, 'but I submit all these matters to your better judgment.'—(Letter 26th April, 1830). Eight months after this she repeats the objection in very explicit terms. 'I do not think the chances equal.'—(Letter 2d December, 1830). Nevertheless, after another pause of above two months, and more explanation from her agent, she signs the contract, which sets forth the various deeds, judicial proceedings, professional consultations, and 'conflicting opinions, by different eminent counsel at the Scottish bar,' and declares, that the compromise is gone into 'with a view to avoid litigation, and being mutually disposed to an amicable arrangement.'

" It was found in the case of Macalister (29th June, 1827), that the circumstance of a party losing a judgment by being kept in ignorance by his agent, formed no ground for disturbing the party who had obtained it. On the same principle, whatever claim the pursuer may have against her agent, it does not appear to the Lord Ordinary that the ignorance or inadvertence of the legal adviser by whom she chose to be guided, can, in a case free from all fraud, be made to affect third parties, who are not said to have been accessory to her being misled.

" The Lord Ordinary has not decided upon homologation as a separate defence, because he conceives it to be superseded hoc statu, by the failure of the pursuer to establish her own case. But undoubtedly, the acts from which homologation is inferred do throw a strong light on the real state of her mind and views, in reference to her own grounds of action. For they amount to this,—that, at a period when it is nearly impossible to believe that she was in any ignorance of her rights, she deliberately enforced what she held to be the meaning of this very contract, and gained materially at the expense of the defender by doing so."

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK having gone over the facts of the case, in regard to which his Lordship arrived at the same conclusion as the Lord Ordinary, observed, —We come now to consider what principle of law ought to regulate the decision of these facts. Our law writers hold that an agreement or transaction regarding doubtful rights is the most difficult of any to upset. So solemn is the nature of agreements of this kind, that Lord Stair seems to think they cannot be “ransacted” even by writings newly recovered,—ex instrumentis noviter repertis.<sup>1</sup> Bankton is equally decisive upon the point. The case of M‘Allister,<sup>2</sup> which is relied on by the defender, appears to me to bear closely on the present question. I am for adhering to the interlocutor.

LORD GLENLEE.—I have come to the same conclusion. After going through the case, I cannot find the least vestige of any thing like fraud. The principle of not disturbing agreements of this nature is one of the best founded in our law. It was well laid down by Lord Alloway in the case of Johnstone v. Paterson (Nov. 29, 1825), that a transaction could not be set aside without an allegation of fraud or concealment, or something equivalent. It is of no consequence that the party did not get all she was entitled to.

LORDS MEADOWBANK and MEDWYN concurred.

1st Division.

It is required by A. S. June 16, 1819, § 3 and 4, that in any application for the poor's roll, the applicant must first obtain a certificate, as to his condition and circumstances, from the minister and two elders of his parish, and that ten days' previous intimation shall be given "to the adverse party" of the time and place fixed for appearing before the minister and elders. The certificate of intimation is declared, § 5 to be one of the warrants for presenting a petition to the Court for the benefit of the poor's roll.

In a multiplepinding where there were said to be above 100 competing claimants, George Grassie was desirous of getting on the poor's roll, and lodged a claim; but, to avoid the heavy expense of intimation to these parties, he emitted his statement before the minister and elders, without making any intimation at all. This was brought under the notice of the Court at moving the petition for the benefit of the poor's roll, and

THE COURT in the circumstances, pronounced this interlocutor:—

"Ordain intimation on the walls and in the minute-book, for ten days, of this petition, and notice to the raiser of the multiplepinding."

Keith v.
Archer.

An action was raised before the Sheriff of Forfarshire, by "James Keith, son of William Keith, farm-servant near Lochee, and living in family with his father, with concurrence of the said William Keith, his father, and him, as administrator-at-law for his said son." The summons further set forth, "That the said James Keith was engaged with William Archer, farmer," to serve him as herd-boy; that he had been cruelly assaulted by Archer and obliged to fly home for safety; "that the said James Keith is entitled to damages," &c., but although Archer "has been required" to make reparation, yet he refuses, &c.: "Therefore the said William Archer, should be decerned, &c., to make payment and satisfaction to the pursuer, the said James Keith," of £20, as "damages and solatium;" and "farther, he should be decerned to make payment to the pursuer of the expenses of process." The will of the summons directed Archer to be charged to compare and "answer at the instance of the said pursuers."

In the defences, it was stated as a dilator, that there was no good instance, because James Keith was in pupillarity, and the action should have been raised solely in name of his father as his administrator in law. This was the style set forth in all the style books. But, if the instance was cured, in consequence of the father being also set forth, in that character, as pursuer, then the summons became incongruous, as it was thus a summons in name of the father alone, and yet contained no conclusion for payment except to the son alone, who, if he had no title to pursue, could not grant a discharge, or be the party in whose favour decree should pass. The pursuers answered that the instance was unexceptionable, as it set forth both the pupil, with concurrence of his father, and also the father as administrator in law for his son; and as the action was brought for behoof of the son, and for reparation of personal injury sustained by him, it was competent to conclude for payment to the son, which the defender would be safe in making, provided he got a discharge from the father, and without which he could not be called on to make it. There was, therefore, no incongruity in the summons, even if the father's instance alone was maintainable. But the pupil, so soon as he had the concurrence of his administrator, was possessed of a persona standi, and could competently set forth his own instance, as had been recognised in a series of decisions.<sup>1</sup>

Keith v.
Archer.

The sheriff “in respect it is admitted that the pursuer James Keith is a boy not ten years of age, and in respect the summons concludes for payment to the said pursuer only, who, in law, has no persona standi, sustained the dilatory defences, dismissed the action, and decerned; and found the pursuer, William Keith, liable in expenses.”

An advocacy was brought in which the Lord Ordinary “remitted to the sheriff with instructions to alter the interlocutors complained of, and to proceed in the cause as shall be just: and found the advocator entitled to the expenses incurred by him in this Court, subject to modification, and decerned.”*

Archer reclaimed on the merits; and Keiths on the point of expenses. The prayer of Keiths’ note was “to alter the above interlocutor, in so far as it finds the advocators entitled to expenses, subject to modification, and to find the advocators entitled to full expenses, without any modification; or to do otherwise in the premises as to your Lordships shall seem proper.”

LORD PRESIDENT.—I think the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary is well founded, and that the Sheriff ought not to have dismissed the action. There is a sufficient instance set forth, and I see no difficulty in the defender’s getting a good discharge from the administrator-in-law for any payment which he may be compelled to make under this action. But I incline to alter the interlocutor as to expenses, and allow full expenses to the advocators.

LORD BALGRAY.—I think the interlocutor right. There are cases where it is not disputed that an action may be raised at the instance of the pupil alone, as where he has to pursue his own administrator. I give no opinion whether these are the only cases in which this can be done, but I refer to them as cases where the competency of so raising a summons is not disputed. In those cases the summons must, of course, conclude for payment to the pupil alone. Such a summons

* NOTE.—“The Sheriff has dismissed this action as incompetent, because it is brought in the name of a pupil, with the concurrence of his father as his administrator-in-law, instead of being brought in the name or at the instance of the father alone. It is true that a pupil, by himself, has no persona standi in judicio, but as soon as his tutor or administrator concurs in the action, the defect of his nonage is supplied because there is a pursuer insisting who has a persona standi. In practice, this concurrence, even when given subsequently to the raising of the action, operates retro, and validates the pursuit. Thus, if a pupil has no tutor or administrator, an action nevertheless may be brought in his own name, and after it comes into Court, a tutor ad litem may be appointed, with whose concurrence the action proceeds; and it is no objection that the summons was raised and executed in the pupil’s name alone, and before any tutor ad litem was appointed. A fortiori, therefore, this action, in which the pupil’s father, as his administrator-in-law, concurs from the first, and is a party to the summons must be competent. See the Decisions, 16th January 1740, Johnston; 22d February 1798, McNeill.

is made valid if a tutor ad litem be appointed by the judge when it comes before him, and then it is followed out, without objection, to a decree. But the very same incongruity, or nearly the same, which is said to exist here, between the instance and the conclusions, must exist in that well known class of cases, where no such objection has ever been sustained. It is true that I do not think the style of the summons in this instance is the most proper that could have been adopted, but that only goes to the question of modifying the expenses. The summons is sufficiently apt and relevant, and ought not to have been dismissed.

Keith v.
Archer.

LORD GILLIES.—I think the interlocutor right except in so far as it modifies the expenses awarded. I see no ground for modification. In general, such a dilatory defence as this can only be stated at the peril of paying all the expenses of the discussion thereby created.

LORD MACKENZIE.—I think the interlocutor is right on the merits. It was scarcely possible to frame a summons more cautiously or safely, so far as regards the instance, for it sets forth both the instance of the pupil with concurrence of the administrator, and also the instance of the administrator himself. The objection therefore is rested solely on the terms of the conclusion, which is for payment of damages to the “pursuer, the said James Keith,” who was the pupil. I think this objection is too critical. This must be read, I think, as a conclusion for payment to be made to James Keith with consent and concurrence of his father as his legal guardian. And I am not at all sure that the opposite conclusion for payment to the other pursuer, William Keith, for behoof of his son the pupil, would have been the best form of a conclusion, or even if it would not be liable to considerable objection. The action may be raised when pupillarity is nearly at an end, so that it expires before decree, and no tutor remains; or the individual tutor may die, and a new tutor may be in his place. It may therefore be unsuitable to insert a conclusion for payment to the individual tutor who raises the action. But without deciding on the effect of any of these contingencies at present I shall merely observe that I have much doubt whether the form of conclusion pointed at by Archer is that which is the best. And in this case where the instance is undoubtedly sufficient, I rather think the conclusion, as it stands, is sufficient also. But even if I were wrong in this, why was the action dismissed? The proper remedy would have been to allow an amendment of the libel, which was all that was required. In regard to expenses, I think there should be no modification. A party who chooses to raise a discussion on a point like this, should, in all the circumstances, be made to pay the cost of it. If he merely had the bona fide object in view, of taking care to get a good discharge, he should have asked for nothing more than an amendment of the libel.

The advocates now moved for expenses in both Courts, and contended that this was embraced within their prayer “for full expenses.” The respondent answered that every prayer, intended to embrace expenses in an inferior court, as well as this Court, set this specially forth: and that, in particular, from the structure of the prayer of this note, it was evident that it was limited to the expenses of this Court, which were asked as “full expenses” in contradistinction to the modification by the Lord Or-

LORD BALGRAY.—On looking at the prayer of this note it seems to be limited in its own terms, to the expenses incurred in this Court. I do not think we can give more than these, but, in terms of the opinion of the Court, they should be the full expenses without modification.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The advocacy brings every thing before us, and it was certainly competent to have asked the expenses of both Courts: and I am doubtful whether the words “full expenses” do not include this.

THE COURT ultimately adopted the view expressed by Lord Balgray that the prayer of the note was not so framed as to apply to the expenses of the inferior court, and the following interlocutor was pronounced:—“Recal the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary reclaimed against, in so far as it finds that the expenses ought to be modified; and find the advocates entitled to full expenses in this Court; and refuse the desire of the reclaiming note for William Archer.”

Lord Jeffrey.

IN the year 1811, the late James Murray of Stirling executed a deed of settlement, conveying to certain trustees, with power to assume others, his whole heritable and moveable property, 1st, For payment of debts; 2dly, To hold the residue for behoof of Mary Murray, his daughter, under burden of an annuity of £50 to Janet M'Callum, his mother, to meet which annuity a capital sum was in the first instance to be set apart, but after the death of Janet M'Callum was to fall into the residue and be payable to Mary Murray; and this residue including the capital sum so set apart, was declared payable to Mary Murray, on her arriving at majority or being married, should the annuitant be then dead: the testator farther appointed the sum of £2000 “to be laid out on good heritable he bond or bonds for which shall be taken payable to my said daughter and their foresaids, for the use and behoof of my said daughter, and of the lawful issue of her body in fee, it being hereby declared that the capital sum shall remain for behoof of her children, vested in trustees, and the survivors or survivor of them, and that the interest thereof shall be payable to her upon her own receipts and, and not be subject to the jus mariti of her husband, or affect his creditors." The proceeds of this sum of £2000 were to be paid to Mary Murray, amongst with the residue above-mentioned, on her being single, or being married. The trustees were empowered to employ an agent or factor, the allowance to whom, "as well as all necessary expenses incurred by them in the administration of this trust, shall be defrayed out of the trust funds, and be sufficiently ascertained by any statement subscribed by the acting trustees."

Nov. 24, 1836
Laird's Assignees v. Murray's Trustees.

Murray died in 1811, his daughter being then six years of age, the trustees under the settlement thereafter accepted and acted in, investing the greater portion of the funds, as directed by the deed, on heritable security. In 1823, Mary Murray was married to James Lockhart, clerk in the house of Laird and Company of Glasgow. By her marriage-contract, she conveyed to him her whole interest in the residue of her father's trust-estates, including the principal of the £500, but excluding the above-mentioned sum of £2000. In 1825, James Lockhart, having become indebted to Laird and Company in the sum of £1000, executed, amongst with his wife, a disposition and assignation of his whole property (with the exception of the special provision of the deed, and particularly of their "claim to the free surplus funds of Murray's trust-estate," in favour of the pursuers, Buchanan and Partners and assignees of Laird and Company.

On the 8th January 1831, Janet M'Callum died. Thereafter, James Lockhart's sole surviving trustee executed a deed of assumption, appointing James Buchanan and Partners to be trustees along with him, and disposing and assigning the trust-estate and the £2000, and the trust-estate generally to himself and the new trustees. Infestment was taken on this disposition. The trustees then paid to Laird and Company, in terms of the disposition, to Mr and Mrs Lockhart, the several sums of £700 and £100 to be paid out of the general residue of the trust estate. Disputes having arisen in the manner in which the farther expenses incidental to the trust-estate were to be defrayed, Laird and Company's assignees raised an action against the trustees, narrating and founding on the provisions of the deed, the marriage-contract of Lockhart and Mary Murray, the deed of assumption and assignation by these parties, and the consequent payments made by the trustees and Company on the death of Janet M'Callum, and concluding that the trustees and Company were liable for the balance and residue of and make payment to the pursuers of the balance of the trust-funds, but under deduction of the expense incurred by the execution of the deed of assumption and relative assignation and infestment, and certain other accounts incurred to their agents in the administration of the trust; submitting farther, that as the trust must still continue in relation to the sum of £2000 provided to Mrs Lockhart's children in fee, such children being then in existence, they should be allowed to retain a portion of the residue above-mentioned, to the extent of £40, to meet the expenses of administering this branch of the trust. They accordingly pleaded, that, in terms of the trust-deed, the "necessary expenses" of management were to be paid out of the trust-funds; and, as the expenses proposed to be deducted were obviously necessary, and the special provision of £2000 ought not to be encroached upon, the deductions in question must be made from the balance of the residue concluded for.

Laird and Company's assignees replied, that they were entitled, under the assignation in favour of the Company, to the free balance of the residue of the estate, which, in terms of the trust-deed, became payable on the death of Janet M'Callum, when the trust must be held to have closed in regard to that part of the estate; and this without deduction of any of the expenses bygone or future, connected with Mrs Lockhart's £2000, excepting always the expenses of the first investment of that sum.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor, adding the subjoined note:—* "Finds, Imo, That up to the time of the death of

* "The preceding findings are grounded on the terms of James Murray's trust-deed, which, if the interlocutor is taken to review, should be printed for the use of the Court. By that deed it is expressly provided that the whole balance of the residue shall be paid over to Mary Murray on the death of Janet M'Callum, if she is then married or of age, provided a sum of £2000 shall have been previously set aside, and then stand vested in heritable security, for the use of Mary Murray and her children. There is no provision, express or implied, that the trustees shall always keep in their hands funds sufficient absolutely to ensure the payment of the whole £2000 to the children, at the mother's death; or that the residue now due to the pursuers shall only be ascertained as at that period. On the contrary, it is expressly provided that it shall be paid on the death of Janet M'Callum, and being so paid and discharged, it appears to the Lord Ordinary that it must then cease to be any part of the trust-estate, and can no more be charged with the future expenses of management than any special legacy which might have been directed to be paid over on the same event. That it is called a residue can obviously occasion no perplexity, when the circumstances and the whole provisions of the deed are duly attended to. It is not the residue after the whole purposes of the trust are affected by paying over the £2000 to the fiars in that sum after the death of the liferentrix, but the residue, expressly, after setting aside that £2000, vesting it on heritable security, and leaving it so vested at the time the residue is payable. Though not liquidated to a specific amount till such vesting is accomplished, and kept up securely till the time of paying the residue, it is necessarily liquidated by those occurrences, and comes from that moment to consist of a definite amount of pounds, shillings, and pence, as specially as if that amount had been set forth in the trust-deed from the beginning. As soon, therefore, as those interested in the sum so liquidated are entitled to be finally paid off, they plainly have no farther interest in the trust, or concern with its management. The trust as to them, in

Janet M'Callum (which is admitted to have happened in 1831, though the month is not specified) the trust must be held to have subsisted, and

but, is absolutely at an end, and having nothing to do with the funds remaining with the trustees, they cannot be in any way responsible for their management or security. The trustees have hitherto spoken only of the expenses of management, and in fact require no other allowances than may be requisite on that account. But if right on principle, they are plainly entitled to go much farther, and to insist upon retaining what may be sufficient, not only for the future administration of the £2000, in which the pursuers have no possible interest, but for any losses which may arise on it without their fault, and it may serve to illustrate the fallacy of the principle to consider this application of it. It is obvious that a great part of the whole trust funds might be lost in this manner, after they had been realized and invested, by latent defects in the borrower's title, a fall in the value of land, or blunders in the security, though prepared by eminent conveyancers, who may have afterwards died insolvent. Now, if this occurred before the residue was payable, and while the whole funds were still lawfully at the disposal of the trustees, the Lord Ordinary thinks it clear, that the loss must have fallen on the residuary fund exclusively, and that the whole of it might have been taken to set aside and invest the £2000 specially provided by the settlement, and this because it was only the residue, after setting aside that special provision that could be claimed, when the day for paying over such residue arrived, and if there was then no such residue, nothing could be due. But if the loss occurred after the residue had been so liquidated and paid, he takes it to be equally clear, on the grounds already stated, that no part of it could possibly be reclaimed or called back from the pursuers, any more than special legacies could be reclaimed from legatees to whom they had been duly paid at the same period. Suppose the deed had provided, that immediately upon Janet M'Callum's death, one-fourth of the whole funds should be paid over to one person, and the other three-fourths vested on heritable security for a life-rent and fee to others; and suppose that this is accordingly done, £1000 paid over on a discharge to A, and £3000 vested in security to B and C, for their respective rights of life-rent and fee: If after this, the security proves insufficient, and a loss of £2000 occurs upon the £3000 so invested, could it possibly be maintained, that A would be bound to repeat one-half of what he had received, because it had not been given as a special legacy, and would still be equal to one-fourth of what would be ultimately received by those to whom three-fourths had been destined. The answer would be, that what he was entitled to was one-fourth of the funds, as they were when he was entitled to payment, and that he was no more answerable for losses that might afterwards occur on the shares not then payable, than if they also had been then paid, but afterwards lost in the hands of the payees themselves. If the sums paid, however, could not be reclaimed to meet such a loss, it is plain, that they could still be retained in contemplation of it: and it is obviously quite impossible to take any distinction between the case of loss or diminution by bad securities, &c., and loss and diminution by expenses of management. The trust deed provides, no doubt, that necessary expenses shall be paid out of the trust funds. But a sum expressly directed to be finally paid over at a certain time, is after that time, no part of the trust funds, and it is only on the funds actually and lawfully in the management of the trustees, that the expenses of managing and protecting such funds can ever be chargeable.

There are other points at issue between those parties, but the Lord Ordinary hopes, that when this main question is settled, the parties will be advised to adjust the rest without further litigation. He cannot but regret that the whole had not been left, as originally proposed, to arbitration. The whole sum in dispute is insignificant, and the parties interested in the reversion, in poor circumstances. It is, therefore, to see the progress of a litigation, which must soon swallow up far more than the sum immediately contested. The Lord Ordinary's opinion at present on the merits of the claims now referred

No. 28. been carried on, for the benefit of those having right to the general residuary fund, as well as of the fiars and liferentrix in the special sum of £2000, and that the whole necessary expenses of management must, up to that date, be chargeable indiscriminately on the whole trust estate, and must consequently fall on the said general residuum, and not on the special provision of £2000 aforesaid : But finds, 2do, That upon the death of the said Janet M'Callum, when the whole of the said residuum became payable to the pursuers of this action, the purposes of the trust must be held to have been accomplished, in so far as related to this residuum, and no part of the future expense ought to be charged against it, except only what might be incurred in the actual uplifting, paying over, and discharging the said residuum itself ; and in particular, finds, 3tio, That no part of the expense afterwards incurred in relation to the management of the said special provision of £2000, whether in renewing the securities and investments thereof, in paying and keeping accounts of the sums due to the liferentrix, in assuming new trustees to protect the interests of the said liferentrix and fiars, or otherwise, can be charged upon those entitled to the said general residuum, and that no part of such residuum can be retained for future contingent expenses, relating to the special provision of fee and liferent aforesaid, and before further answer appoints the cause to be enrolled, that parties may state whether they are agreed as to the effect of the preceding findings, on the actual state of the accounting, and whether they insist for judgment on the remaining points in the cause."

Murray's Trustees reclaimed.

On the note coming to be advised (December 18, 1835),

Rutherford, for the Trustees, suggested that the children of Mary Murray ought to be called as parties to the process.

The Dean of Faculty, for the Pursuers, answered, that having advanced so far in the case, and the defenders having joined issue with them on the closed record, this proposal came too late, and the pursuers were now entitled to judgment.

The Court held, that the children, as in right of the fee of the provision of £2000, had a material interest to oppose the interlocutor, and should be called accordingly ; which, if they were satisfied that the children ought to be in the field, it was competent to allow at this stage of the process.

Their Lordships accordingly, " before farther advising, allowed the

The minor questions, as to overcharges and interests, might be easily settled by the agents or the auditor of Court."

Laird's Assignees v.
Murray's Trustees.

Thereafter, Laird and Company's assignees raised a supplementary action, calling as defenders, for their interest, the children of Mrs Lockhart, together with their tutors and curators nominate in reference to the provision of £2000, and also Mr and Mrs Lockhart, and concluding to have the two actions conjoined, and to have it farther found and declared, that the trust subsisted only till the death of Janet M'Callum, up to which time the expenses of management were chargeable on the general residuum of the estate; but that, after that event, the whole of the residue became payable to the pursuers, and the purposes of the trust, in so far as related to it, were accomplished, and also that no part of the expense incurred in relation to the special provision of £2000, whether in renewing the securities or assuming new trustees to protect the interests of the liferentrix and fiars, could be charged upon the pursuers who were now in right of the general residue. The summons then concluded, in terms of the former action, for count and reckoning, and payment of the free balance of the residuary fund.

A tutor ad litem having been appointed to the children, they made appearance, and, without making up a record, maintained, generally, in defence, that the expenses in question ought to be deducted from the balance pursued for.

The cause was this day put out for advising on the merits.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The testator requires the trustees to make the £2000 effectual by the bonds being taken to themselves, showing that he contemplated a continuance of the trust. Then all the necessary expenses of the trust are to be defrayed out of the trust-funds, according to the express terms of the deed. Now, were not the deeds of assumption of trustees to fulfil the purposes of the testator, as well as the expenses attending the bonds for the £2000, such as inferred "necessary expenses?" The expense attending them must be retained out of the general trust-funds, and not laid on the special provision of £2000. I am therefore for altering the interlocutor.

LORD MEADOWBANK.—I agree, and this was my opinion from the first.

LORD GLENLER.—I am also for altering. It appeared to me very plain that the first part of the interlocutor was expressed in too positive terms, as to the trust being ended by the death of the old woman. The deed only provides for the residue being then payable; but the death of Janet M'Callum did not put an end to the trust, which must subsist till the issue thereof, and till the residue be ascertained.

LORD MEDWYN.—This is one trust, and the whole of the fund of £2000 is to go to Mary Murray in liferent, and to her children in fee. The case might have been different, had there been separate interests under the trust; but I cannot separate the interests of the mother and the children. The trust is to be kept up till Janet M'Callum's death, its continuance being clearly contemplated by the deed. The £2000 is provided entire to the parties beneficially interested.

No. 28. We cannot lay the expenses of the trust—and no trust can be kept up with expense—either on the liferentrix or the fiars.

Inch v.
Thomson.

THE COURT accordingly altered, and found that the necessary expenses the trust must be defrayed out of the general residue of the trust-fund and allowed £40 to be reserved for future expenses of management; finding the defenders entitled to the expenses of the discussion on this point both here and in the Outer-House.

Husband and Wife—Marriage Contract—Clause.—A military officer, by marriage contract, bound himself to provide his wife, in the event of his premature decease, with an annuity, payable to the widows of officers from a certain fund which he was a subscriber, which annuity was, by the regulations of the fund, subject to reduction by the directors on a falling off of funds, and to suspension on a second marriage of the widow:—1. By the regulations of the Bombay Military Fund, the widow of a Lieutenant-Colonel in the Company's service subscribing to the fund was entitled, on his death, to an annuity of £365. Amongst the regulations were the following:—"If a widow who is an annuitant on fund should marry, her annuity shall cease during her coverture; but in case of her again becoming a widow, she shall then be entitled to receive the annuity formerly granted to her." And, "Should the fund, however, at any period fall short of the demands upon it, so that the annual income will not defray the amount of the annuities and other claims, then it shall be in the power of the directors to make a proportionate deduction from the annuity of each annuitant, and from the payments to other claimants above the rank of subaltern, until the state of the fund shall afford the means to complete payment; when, if a surplus income exists, the arrears shall be made good from the amount of surplus, but not otherwise."

Forlong v.
Taylor's
Executors.

In the year 1822, the late John Taylor, then Major in the East India Company's service, married the pursuer, Agnes Forlong. Certain previous communings took place as to the settlements, between Miss Forlong's father, and Taylor, from which it appeared that the latter was possessed of about £6000 in India, in addition to his commission. In a letter to Mr Forlong, Taylor wrote as follows:—

"I take the liberty of sending you the East India Register, wherein you will find, at page 336, that the widow of a major is entitled to receive from the military fund, of which I am an original subscriber, the sum of

A colonel's widow to the sum of "All this I can do from my present funds, and the remainder of what fortune I may die possessed of shall be left to my children, if I have any, save and except the sum of at least £100 a-year to my sister Helen, should she survive me. * * *

"Do not, however, misunderstand me, for I am perfectly willing that any farthing you or Mrs Forlong may leave your daughter shall be at her own free disposal, provided you do not bind me down to any settlement in addition to the military fund, as it would only injure me, without in the smallest degree benefiting your daughter. Let the money be at her disposal, and I am satisfied."

The East India Register for 1822 was, in terms of this, sent to Mr Forlong, but it did not contain the regulations.

Forlong v.
Taylor's
Executors.

In the marriage-contract, Taylor bound and obliged himself “and perform all and whatever may be necessary and incumbent upon as a subscriber to the Bombay Military Fund, to secure to his promised wife, in the event of his predeceasing her, the benefit of the pension or annuity payable from the said fund to the widow of a subscriber, according to the rank he holds or shall hold in the Company’s army for the time; and failing thereof, or in case the said pension or annuity, for whatever cause, shall not be available to his promised wife, in the event of the foresaid, saving and excepting only through her right to and possession of such separate funds as by the rules and regulations of the said fund would exclude her from all benefit thereby, then the said John Taylor binds and obliges himself, his heirs and successors, to make payment to the said Agnes Forlong, his promised wife, in the event of her surviving him, of a clear yearly jointure or annuity, equal to the pension that hath hitherto been paid or shall be payable from the said fund to the widow of a subscriber holding the same rank in the army which now belongs or shall belong to the said John Taylor at the time of his death, and at two terms in the year, Whitsunday and Martinmas, by equal portions, beginning the first term’s payment of the said jointure or annuity at the first term of Martinmas or Whitsunday that may happen after the death of John Taylor’s death, and so on thereafter half-yearly during her life with the lawful interest,” &c. “Declaring, that in the event, as long as the said Agnes Forlong shall draw and receive from the said military fund a pension or annuity equal to the pension that has hitherto been paid, or shall be payable, therefrom to the widow of a subscriber holding same rank, which now belongs, or shall belong, to the said John Taylor, at the time of his death, or would have been entitled to draw and receive such pension and annuity, had she not possessed such separate funds, as by the rules and regulations of the said fund exclude her from all benefit thereby, as is before provided, the personal obligation he hath undertaken by him shall be suspended, any and while she is provided with the aforesaid from the said fund, or has lost the benefit of the fund from any cause above referred to: And for a provision or jointure in favour of the said promised wife, in the event of her surviving him, the said John Taylor hereby assigns to the said Agnes Forlong the benefit of the pension or yearly annuity to which she may be entitled as his widow from the said fund as aforesaid, and also the benefit of the pension or annuity payable from any other fund to the widow of an officer of his the said John Taylor’s rank in the service of the said Honourable East India Company, and that agreeably to the rules and regulations of the said fund or funds respectively, and likewise all right, title, and interest in the provision secured on the said Agnes Forlong by her father as after mentioned,

He likewise became bound to provide to the children of the marriage—if one, a sum of £3000, if more than one, £5000; and these provisions were to be accepted by the wife and children in full satisfaction of their legal rights. Mr Forlong, on his part, "in consideration of the marriage, and of the jointure or annuity settled upon his daughter, and of the obligations undertaken in favour of the expected issue of the marriage," bound himself to pay to his daughter and Taylor during his own life an annuity of £150; and, at his death, a sum of £3500, in liferent, the fee being provided to the children of the marriage.

The parties having thereafter gone to India, Taylor subsequently attained the rank of lieutenant-colonel, and died in 1828, leaving one child, a daughter. By his last will he named executors, bequeathing his whole property (from £12,000 to £15,000), to this child, whom failing, to his sisters, and stating in regard to his wife, "No provision is herein made for my wife, Agnes Forlong, she being already amply provided for by the marriage-contract."

Colonel Taylor having regularly paid the rates of the Bombay Military Fund, his widow became entitled, at his death, to the annuity of £365. Upon the footing of this amount of annuity, the directors of the fund settled with her up to 30th April, 1831. In the spring of that year, it was ascertained, from the report of a professional gentleman, "that the resources of the fund were not adequate to provide for the benefits held out by the present regulations;" and the directors accordingly resolved upon certain reductions on the scale of annuities, in terms of which resolution, Mrs Taylor's annuity was reduced from £365 to £250.

Thereafter Mrs Taylor made application to her husband's executors to make good the difference between the rate of the annuity thus reduced and the rate as it stood at the date of Colonel Taylor's death, and also intimated that, in the event of her again marrying, and thus forfeiting her right to payment from the fund, she would look to the executors for an equivalent out of her husband's estate.

On the executors refusing to recognise these claims, she raised action against them, concluding to have the executors ordained to make payment of the sums necessary to make up her annuity to £365, from and after 30th April, 1831; and farther, to have it found and declared that, in the event of her entering into a second marriage, and thereby forfeiting her right to the annuity payable from the fund, she should be entitled to a jointure of £365 per annum out of Colonel Taylor's estate during the subsistence of the second marriage.

Nov. 24, 1836.
 Orleong v.
 Taylor's
 Executors.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor, adding the subjoined note ; *—Finds, that, upon a just construction of the marriage

* " There is some difficulty in this case, from the consideration that the amount of provision from the Military Fund must have been known to be liable to fluctuation ; and that the pursuer would clearly have had the benefit, if the rates had been raised instead of lowered, subsequent to her husband's decease. But, considering the plain equity and expediency (and consequent presumption of intention) of rendering the conventional jointure of a widow (for which she had conveyed a large tocher, and renounced her legal rights) in some measure, fixed and secure, the Lord Ordinary can put no other construction upon the very broad words of the subsidiary obligation of the husband, in all cases ' where the pension shall not be available, from any cause whatever,' to make up the deficiency, than that they entitle her to have it at all times made up to the sum which the fund either yielded, or might have yielded at the period of the husband's death. If it had not this meaning, it is difficult to understand why it was at all introduced ; and it is obvious that, if not so guarded, the provision might fluctuate in the most distressing manner, or substantially fail altogether, without the widow having any recourse whatever. Take even the case first contemplated for a recourse on the husband's estate, and which the defenders represent as most favourable for their construction of the whole clause, viz. the case of the widow having no claim on the fund, in consequence of the husband having forfeited all right to it before his death, by neglecting to do what was necessary to keep it up, withholding his termly contributions or otherwise. Suppose that, in this way, the husband had ceased to have any interest in the fund ten years before his death, what would then have been the claim of the widow on his private estate ? Would it have been for a fixed and invariable jointure or life annuity of the same amount, as she would have drawn the first year of her widowhood from the fund, if she had had right to it ? Or to an annuity fluctuating with every variation in the state, or regulations of a foreign fund, out of which she was never actually to receive any thing, and with which her husband had had no connexion for years ? Even in that case, the Lord Ordinary would decide for the fixed annuity ; and would hold that the fund was only to be looked at, as the army list was to be looked at, viz. in order to ascertain, by the one, what rank was held by the husband at his death, and, by the other, what was the amount then payable to the widow of such an officer, from the fund. Those things it would be necessary to ascertain, because they were the elements by which the amount of the life annuity out of the husband's estate was directed by the contract to be fixed. But, except for that purpose, the parties had nothing to do with the fund—not with its past or future fluctuations. In the case that had occurred, the widow was to be provided wholly and entirely by a jointure out of the husband's estate—and it was only to settle its amount that a fund with which he had once been connected was referred to. But, that amount being once settled, her right, for all the rest of her life, was a right to a jointure out of property in Britain—and nothing could be more contrary to the nature and object of such a provision, than to suppose that it was to vary with the variations of a foreign institution, in which none of the parties had any interest—and that the husband's representatives were to send out to Bombay, every six months, before they could know with what jointure his estate was chargeable.

" But the actual case is much stronger ;—for the contract expressly provides that the widow shall have recourse for a jointure on the husband's estate, not only if he fail to do all that depended on him to give her right to the fund, but if 'from any cause whatsoever, the said pension shall not be available to her.' Now, what pension is it that is here spoken of ? And what is meant by its not being available ? To the Lord Ordinary it appears plain that it is the pension payable to the pursuer, contract labelled, the pursuer is entitled (except in the special case therein expressly excepted) to a free yearly jointure or annuity out of the funds and at the time of her husband's death—and that it ceases to be available when more than one half of it is withheld.

"The defenders seemed chiefly to rely on the clause in the contract, by which the pension from the fund is made over 'agreeably to the rules and regulations of the said fund;' and on the allegation that it was in accordance with one of those regulations that its amount had been recently abridged. Now the Lord Ordinary is of opinion that the rules and regulations here referred to, mean only the rules as to the mode and manner of payment, the certificates to be produced, the agents to be applied to, &c., and not conditions of restriction or forfeiture of the pension itself, and he thinks this construction is confirmed by that which, at all events, furnishes a conclusive answer to the whole defence, viz. that the clause binding the husband to provide a jointure, if the pension shall from any cause cease to be available, is qualified by one anxious and express exception,—which would be altogether unmeaning and unnecessary if the pension had been understood to be given under the purview of those rules and regulations, which imported a contingent forfeiture or restriction. The exception is, that, in spite of the broad and general words already quoted, the husband shall not be liable for a jointure, in the case of the pension not being available to the widow, 'through her right to and possession of such separate funds, as by the rules and regulations of the said fund, would exclude her from all benefit thereby;' and it is anxiously provided, that 'saving and excepting that case only,' he shall be liable for jointure whenever, from whatever cause, the pension shall not be available. Now, it is utterly impossible to explain or account for the introduction of these words, except upon one of two suppositions—both equally conclusive in the pursuer's favour—either, first, that the rules and regulations referred to in the clause assigning the pension, did not mean rules and regulations of this description at all; or that they were all meant to be superseded (except in the case specially excepted) by the important, and the Lord Ordinary will add, most just and necessary clause, binding the husband to supply, from his own estate, what might from any cause be actually deficient in the provision.

"The defenders seemed also to maintain that the pension, though diminished in amount, was in point of fact still available to the pursuer,—that it had not been entirely cut off, as they expressed it,—and that though compensation might be due for a total privation, it was not for a partial. To the Lord Ordinary, however, this seems quite untenable, considering the onerous and favourable nature of the claim especially. Suppose that, instead of being reduced from £365 to £250, it was reduced to £5 or to 5s., do the defenders really maintain, that in that case the husband's estate is to pay nothing, while it would have been chargeable with a jointure of £365, if the 5s. also had failed, and it was reduced to nothing? If the Lord Ordinary be right in thinking that the obligation truly was to secure an annuity equal to the pension as at the husband's death, then it is plain that the obligation became prestable, whenever any part of that was withheld, or when her provision was diminished, whether by a third, or a half, or the whole.

"It is needless to say any thing as to Lord Clive's fund, from which it is admitted, the pursuer never received any thing—and to which it is obvious that she never was entitled.

"The argument that the pursuer must forfeit all claim on her late husband's estate, as well as on the fund, if she should ever marry again, is of course sufficiently answered, if the Lord Ordinary is right in holding that the clause relied on by the pursuer supercedes, and was intended to protect her against, all forfeiting regulations, except that which is specially excepted. But the terms in which the obligation to grant a jointure is conceived, seemed to have been intended specially to exclude this particular case. For while the regulations expressly bear that the pursuer shall enjoy their pensions 'during their widowhood, and not otherwise;' he provided to the pursuer, is expressly covenanted to be paid half 'her life.'" estate of her late husband, of such an amount, as, along with what she may draw from the Bombay Military Fund, shall make up an annual allowance of £365, and that for all the days of her natural life, and whether she shall or shall not enter into any second or other marriage; and therefore repels the defences, and declares and decerns in terms of the conclusions of the libel: Finds expenses due, allows an account thereof to be given in, and remits the same when lodged to the auditor for his taxation and report."

The executors reclaimed.

The Court having ordered cases, the pursuer, who had in the mean time contracted a second marriage to a Mr Joseph, maintained, in support of her action:—

1. The marriage contract in question is to be construed according to what may be regarded as the intention of the parties, gathered from its whole terms and import, and also from the evidence of the previous communications; and this intention was, to secure to the pursuer, as Colonel Taylor's widow, a jointure which should be of a fixed and permanent description.

2. Looking to the actual terms of the contract, fairly and not judaically interpreted, the pursuer became entitled, in return for the onerous equivalents thereby conferred on her husband, to have secured to her a jointure or annuity equal in amount to the pension payable, and expressly held out as payable, by the Bombay Military Fund at the date of the marriage; and so far as there is a deficiency from the jointure so secured, in the sum at present received from the fund, she is entitled to have that amount made up to her from her husband's estate. The circumstance, inter alia, of the contract providing that the jointure should not be made up, when reduced by the operation of a particular regulation (viz. that as to the widow's possession of such separate effects as by the rules of the fund would exclude her from the benefit thereof), and should be made up in all other cases whatever, clearly proves, that in the present case where the jointure has failed by the operation of another regulation altogether, the deficiency thereby arising must be made good. Again, the obligation undertaken by Colonel Taylor to make payment of an annuity equal to the pension that "has hitherto been paid, or shall be payable" from the fund to the widow of a subscriber holding the same rank "which now belongs or shall belong" to himself at the time of his death, exclude the idea of a fluctuation of the fund having been contemplated; at all events not after the date of Colonel Taylor's death.

3. The pursuer is further entitled, under her marriage-contract, to have the amount of this annuity made up to her from her husband's estate, in the event of the pension payable from the fund ceasing in consequence of her entering into a second marriage; the marriage-contract specially providing that such should be the case, whenever "the said pension or annuity, from whatever cause, shall not be available," &c

And the annuity being also specially provided to be paid at two terms N in the year, &c. "during her life."

The defenders, on the other hand, argued :

Nav.
Forls
Tayl
Exec

1. The leading clause of the contract, in express words, assigns for a provision or jointure, the benefit of the pension or yearly annuity, to which the pursuer may be entitled, as widow, from the Bombay fund ; and her jointure must be held therefore as consisting specifically of what the contract expressly provides therefor ; the main portion of the other clauses have nothing more for their object, than to impose the obligation on Colonel Taylor, of keeping up his subscription, for the purpose of securing his widow a place upon the fund.

2 In estimating her annuity, the pursuer is not entitled to be placed in any more favourable situation, as regards the deductions which the directors of the fund are entitled by its rules and regulations to make, than other widows of the same class and rank.

3. Neither the deduction therefore which has been made in respect of the inadequacy of the Bombay fund, nor the forfeiture to which the pursuer has given occasion by her own act of entering into a second marriage, are to be regarded as deductions against which she has any right to be restored, at the expense of her husband's estate and her child's succession. These views are confirmed by the evidence of intention to be gathered from Colonel Taylor's letter to Mr Forlong, previous to the marriage.

4. The estate of the deceased is, according to the contract, liable only in two events, viz. his own failure to keep up the benefit of the fund for his widow, and the event of the widow's being deprived of her right to claim against the fund from some other cause ; but, as to the first, it is admitted that the contingency has not occurred, and as to the second case, the benefit of the fund can never be said to have become unavailable to the pursuer, seeing that, as just stated, it is at this moment not less available to her than it is to every other widow of the same rank similarly situated, and that nothing that her husband could possibly have done would have had the effect to place her, in this respect, in any more favourable position than that in which she actually stands.

The cause was put out for advising, February 25, 1836.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—In considering the proper meaning and construction of the contract, I think we are not warranted, even though it is ambiguous, in resting upon the previous correspondence. The deed was an onerous contract solemnly entered into, and from it we must take the rights of the parties, keeping in view no doubt their relative situation at its date. We must look at the contract as a whole, in order to ascertain the true nature of the obligation undertaken by Colonel Taylor. I cannot begin with what is comparatively an insignificant part of it, viz. the clause assigning to the pursuer the benefit of the annuity from the fund. The main obligation is, that we are to look to the relative situation of the parties respectively to perform. Going to the commencement of the contract, the lady is to receive a considerable sum from her father ; Colonel Taylor undertakes expressly to secure her effectually in the full interest demandable by the widow of an officer from the fund to which he was a subscriber, and " failing thereof, or in case the said pension or annuity, from whatever cause, shall not be available to his promised wife," he binds and obliges himself to make payment to her of a clear yearly jointure, equal to the pension payable from the fund. Having regard, then, first to his obligation to make the annuity from the fund effectual, and next to the alternative contemplated of its not being available from any cause whatever, saving and excepting one cause only,—I can see no principle to warrant me in going beyond this single exception, and holding that the annuity is not to be made good, if it should fail from any other cause. When Taylor became bound to secure the pursuer in a jointure, " equal to the pension that has hitherto been paid, or shall be payable " from the fund, to the widow of a subscriber holding the rank which " now belongs, or shall belong," to himself at the time of his death, the words " shall be payable " must be held to apply to the possibility of his rising to a higher rank. I see no vestige of reference to a second marriage. On the principles applicable to such cases, and looking to the contract itself, which is not to be stretched or perverted, I agree with the Lord Ordinary. If the whole fund had been swallowed up in India, which is not an impossible supposition, where houses have failed to the extent of seventeen millions sterling, would Mrs Taylor have been left without a jointure at all ? Colonel Taylor appears to me to have taken the annuity provided by this fund, as the measure of his obligation ; and the expressions used in the deed seem clearly to imply that this lady was to be secured in a jointure to the extent of the annuity payable at his death. I am for adhering to the interlocutor in all respects.

LORD MEDWYN.—I ought to give my opinion with diffidence, as it is contrary to that now delivered from the Chair. In this case we are to look to the intention of parties, and how that intention has been carried into effect. Considering the deed as a whole, I think it was Colonel Taylor's intention, that his widow should receive no jointure, but only the pension competent to his widow out of the Bombay fund, which was a fluctuating fund. I have no objections to begin at the commencement of the contract. The contract says, that Colonel Taylor shall do what is necessary to provide for the lady on his death. But it is a jointure only she is to have from him ; and, to show from what source it is intended this jointure shall be supplied, he " assigns " to her the benefit of the pension from the fund. Now is this a fixed annuity ? I cannot so view it. All that Taylor undertakes to do, is to make the pension effectual. From the terms used, it seems to be clear that Mrs Taylor is entitled to be provided only to the pension the fund can afford, and has no claim beyond other widows. Suppose it had risen, we shall say to £400, she would have been entitled to receive this increased annuity. The clause " or in case the annuity, from whatever cause, shall not be available " is a difficult part of the case. I think it refers to a total failure of the fund. The fund might have been given up, or been ruined by bankruptcies ; and for such events only the alternative provision is made. She now draws what other widows do ; if the fund should improve, the arrears will be paid up. It is easy to put extreme cases, as that her annuity might be reduced to £5 ; but this would be a total failure, and our powers as a court of equity might in such a case have enabled us to give relief. In regard to the second marriage, if in consequence of it the lady fail to receive her annuity from the fund, she is not entitled, because she has chosen to enter into another marriage, to have it made up from her first husband's estate.

LORD GLENLEE.—I have great difficulty. This is a marriage contract sui generis. I am inclined to think that the loss of the pension in consequence of the second marriage will fall to be made up by the defenders. As to the other part of the question, I incline to Lord Medwyn's opinion. We must take the rights of the parties from the contract, and cannot refer to the extrajudicial correspondence. I think one assumption of the Lord Ordinary is erroneous, as to the presumption of intention (that the jointure should be fixed), arising from the father having conveyed a large tocher; it is truly all the other way, the husband being excluded from the fund and from all jus mariti. The contract gives it to the wife, and nothing to the husband. I think the obligatory words should be taken against the husband as narrowly as is proper. It seems to me that all he warranted was the pension which, at his death, became payable from the fund to his widow. As to its becoming unavailable by a second marriage, I incline to agree with the chair that, in such case, the defenders are liable, as it is a cause different from the possession of another fortune, and there is no provision as to forfeiture in the event of a second marriage.

LORD MEADOWBANK.—I cannot understand on what principle it can be considered that this lady's right is subject to be curtailed by a second marriage, of which there is no mention in the whole of the contract. It is not to be curtailed by inference or implication. As to the other point, I think no stronger words could be used to fix a certain provision, and see no evidence that it was ever supposed, at the period of the marriage, that the fund in question was a variable fund. It is plain that Colonel Taylor held out to his father-in-law, that here was a fixed annuity, which should be the mean and measure of the provision Mrs Taylor had to look to in the event of his death, whether he died major or colonel. The terms of the contract, which have been already referred to, seem to me clearly to imply that in the event of the pension from the fund not being available from any cause, except the one which is mentioned, Taylor bound himself to make payment to his widow of a jointure equal to such pension; and I must see words equally clear in support of the opposite view, before consenting that the right of this party shall be infringed upon.

The Court being thus equally divided, the cause was allowed to stand over. Thereafter the other judges were consulted, and returned the following opinions:—

LORDS PRESIDENT and GILLIES.—We are of opinion that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary is well founded, and ought to be adhered to, and as we entirely agree in the views taken by the Lord Ordinary in his note, we do not think it necessary to assign any other reason for our opinion.

LORD FULLERTON.—I think the judgment of the Lord Ordinary right; and in this I concur in the reasonings by which the interlocutor is supported.

In addition, I may be permitted to express a doubt, whether one consideration supposed to create the chief difficulty of the case, has not been somewhat exaggerated. I see no ground for holding that the rates of provision from the fund are known to be subject to rise or fall. In the first place, even "Regulations of the fund," founded on by the defenders, I see no provision for, or allusion to, any rise of the rates ; and, secondly, I think it quite clear from the previous correspondence of the parties, that the only information held by the lady's father, on the subject of the military fund and its regulations, was that given in the East India Register of 1822, in which there is not a word of the power of the directors to reduce the rates. On the contrary, the sums there specified are described " as the annuities which the widows are entitled to receive ;" those annuities being subject, indeed, to certain conditions and deductions, but in other respects dependent only on the rank held by officers at their death. And it is to be observed, that those specified annuities are not only generally referred to, but are proved by the correspondence to have formed the data on which various other pecuniary calculations entering into the contract were framed.

Considering that this was information communicated by Colonel Taylor, one of the contracting parties, and evidently acted on by the other, I hold myself entitled to look to it in canvassing those disputed or ambiguous passages of the contract, on which the defenders now endeavour to fix a construction decidedly unfavourable to the party to whom those representations were made.

Keeping this in view, I think both the letter and the spirit of the contract are in favour of the pursuer's claims.

By the leading clause, Colonel Taylor binds himself to perform whatever may be necessary for him " as a subscriber to the fund," to secure to the lady, on his predecease, " the benefit of the pension or annuity payable from the said fund to the widow of a subscriber, according to the rank he holds or shall hold at the time." And he afterwards assigns that pension or annuity to the lady, which assignment, however, was no more than a mere form ; as, if the subscriptions were paid, the annuity must have taken effect in her favour without it. If the matter had rested there, she probably might have been held to confine her claims to the benefit of the military fund, subject to all the hazards attending it. But it is needless to inquire into this, because by the contract, there is expressly superadded, a personal obligation on the part of Colonel Taylor ; and the whole question turns on the meaning of that obligation.

By it, failing his performance of what is incumbent on him as a subscriber, " or in case the said pension or annuity, from whatever cause, shall not be available to his promised wife," saving and excepting one case (which it is unnecessary here to notice), he binds himself to pay to the lady " a jointure or annuity, equal to the pension that has hitherto been paid or shall be payable from the said fund to the widow of a subscriber, holding the same rank in the army which now belongs or shall belong to the said John Taylor at the time of his death."

The first question here, regards the contingency on which the personal obligation is to be called into operation, viz., whether it comprehends the case of the deficiency of the military fund ? Now, upon this I cannot entertain a doubt. The parties, in the passage immediately preceding, had been dealing with " the pension or annuity payable from the fund to the widow of a subscriber, according to the rank he holds or shall hold in the Company's army." In construing a marriage contract, a deed intended to regulate the pecuniary interests of parties, it would be absurd to suppose that those expressions bore reference merely to the source from which the annuity was payable, and not to its actual amount ; and, accordingly, it is proved in this case, by the previous correspondence, that the East India Register was sent to the lady's father for the very purpose of shewing what the amount the pension or annuity was. The "said pension or annuity," then, I hold to be in sound construction, that pension or annuity, which, according to the husband's representation, was payable from the fund, viz., a certain amount in pounds, shillings, and pence; and there is the less difficulty in this, because there is no dispute, that, at the time, his representation was true. It seems to me to follow, that "such pension or annuity" ceases to be "available," when the party by whom it is due cannot pay it. The term "available" includes the two conditions, of the title of the creditor on the one hand, and the capacity of the debtor to pay, on the other; and cannot remain applicable where only one of the conditions exists. It would be rather startling to maintain expressly, what is done by implication here, on the part of the defender, that a widow's right to an annuity from an insurance office or benefit society, must, in a question with her husband's representatives, who are subsidiarily bound, be held to be "available" to her, merely because she has a right to make the demand, and independently altogether of the consideration how far the society or insurance office is enabled to meet it.

The only other point, then, to be enquired into, is the extent of the personal obligation come under by the husband. He is bound to pay a jointure or annuity equal to the pension, "that has hitherto been paid, or shall be payable," &c. And it is here that, in my opinion, the only difficulty lies; because the words may admit of the inference, that the parties had in view the possible fluctuations of the rates of allowance from the fund.

But, in the first place, that inference is not absolutely necessary. It may be merely a tautological form of expression, suited in the tense, to the double or alternative form of the conclusion of the sentence, in which reference is made to the rank "which now belongs or shall belong to the said John Taylor at the time of his death; according to which view, the future or contingent form of expression would merely apply to the change of rate which might arise from the husband attaining, before his death, a higher rank than that which he then held. At all events, and even admitting the expression to be dubious, I am bound to adopt that one of the two constructions, which is most consistent with what I consider to be the only admissible presumption, viz., that the parties contemplated no other fluctuation of the amount of the annuities, than that which arose from the gradations of military rank.

But, 2dly, I rather think, that, even on a stricter examination of the terms employed, the clause in question is quite consistent with the claim now made by the pursuer. For here, too, the defender's argument will be found to assume a particular sense of the term, "payable," viz., that which the military fund does or can pay. But that is not the only sense, nor is it the most usual sense. Certainly not that which must be adopted in construing a subsidiary obligation of this kind. Its most ordinary, and, as I think, its legitimate meaning is, what the debtor ought to pay, in other words, that which is due. Now, in this sense, the original annuity is still payable. The clause in the regulations, referred to by the defenders, does not authorize the directors to wipe off the debt, but only to oblige the annuitants to accept a dividend, under an express reservation of their claims, if the funds of the institution ever afford a surplus. It provides, that if the "fund falls short, the directors shall have the power to make a proportional deduction from the annuity of each annuitant, until the state of the fund shall afford the means to complete the same. If a surplus income exists, the arrears shall be made good from the same."

No. 30.
 Nov. 24, 1836.
 Forlong v.
 Taylor's
 Executors.

It does not appear to me that, even by this clause, the annuities, as originally fixed, have absolutely ceased to be "payable." Therefore, even if it could be shown, which it is not, that the marriage-contract was framed in the knowledge and contemplation of that clause of the regulations, I should rather think that the words, "which shall be payable," must be held not to limit the personal obligation to that which, independently altogether of such obligation, the widow could get from the fund, but to bind the husband to make good the annuity, which though continuing "payable," or "due," the military fund might be at the time unable to pay.

From the great difference of opinion which has arisen on this case, it would be presumptuous to deny its difficulty. But, upon the fullest consideration which I have been able to bestow on it, I cannot help thinking, that unless an unusually rigorous interpretation should be adopted, in construing this marriage contract, the claims of the widow must be sustained.

LORD JEFFREY.—I entirely concur in this opinion. I do not think I had any other variation in view than that which might arise from the husband's advancement in military rank. I have nothing material to add, except that the clause in the contract, which contemplates the temporary suspension of the widow's available right to the fund, and makes her claim on her husband's estate defeasible at the revival of such available right, taken along with the clause in the regulations entitling the widows, whose allowances have been restricted, to "complete payment" out of any surplus that may afterwards accrue, appears to me to afford a strong confirmation of the view adopted in the preceding opinion, and in my original interlocutor.

LORD COCKBURN.—I am of opinion that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary ought to be reversed.

I can see nothing in the contract, as it actually stands, except an obligation by the husband to keep up his interest in the military fund, and an assignation to his widow of the benefit of it after his death, whatever it might at any time amount to. Her "provision or jointure" is expressly declared to consist of "the benefit of the pension or yearly annuity to which she may be entitled as his widow from the said fund, &c., agreeably to the rules and regulations." There is no guarantee that the fund shall produce any particular annuity. On the contrary when he anticipates that it may not be available to her, and engages to provide a substitute, he only binds himself to pay her a yearly sum, "equal to the pension that has been paid or shall be payable from the said fund, to the widow of a subscriber holding the same rank in the army which now belongs, or shall belong to the said John Taylor at the time of his death." These last words were plainly not intended to fix, and do not in fair construction import, that the annuity which the fund might happen to afford at his demise, should in all time coming be kept up out of his estate. They merely import that she should receive the pension, whatever it might periodically be, due to the widows of those holding the same rank which her husband held when he died. There is no obligation to make up deficiencies below this as a fixed sum. The only failure that he provides for is a total one; and, accordingly, the only substitute created is, not that any deficiency shall be supplied, but that the widow shall receive out of his estate "a pension equal to what shall be payable from the said fund." It was surely not meant that he should pay her a sum equal to what she got from the fund.

I hold, therefore, that the parties had a source of income liable to variation in their view, or at least that, though they may not have thought of this at all (which is not improbable), the deed they executed implies it, and that, though unfortunate results may be stated as arising out of partial, or nearly total, failures of the fund, it is not the business of a court to correct this. Arrangements by assignments of property liable to change in its productiveness—such as shares in the public stocks—are not uncommon, and similar results are incident to them all. The military fund might possibly have risen instead of fallen, and the widow have got the benefit of this rise.

I am farther of opinion, that her losing the military pension by entering into a second marriage was not an event for which her husband's estate must provide. I am aware that he makes his "property responsible if the pension shall become unavailable from whatever cause, saving and excepting only through her right to, and possession of, such separate funds, as, by the rules and regulations of the said fund, exclude her from all benefit thereby." But I do not think that these words can reach the case in which the fund is made unavailable by the act of the wife herself. There are many acts of hers, besides contracting a second marriage, by which she may deprive herself of the benefit of it. She may decline to claim, or may omit the periodical certificates or affidavits. Can it be maintained that her late husband's property and heirs are to suffer by such proceedings, whereby she, having the full benefit of the fund, chooses to forego it? It would require very unequivocal words indeed to sanction such a result—a result which I am the more inclined to resist, from the extreme improbability that it was ever intended to enable the widow to marry a second time at the expense of her first husband, and to reach his property by voluntarily quitting her hold on a prior equivalent provided by him. The military fund has not proved unavailable from any cause, but she has renounced it.

LORDS MACKENZIE, CORNHUSE and MONCREIFF.—The interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary finds, that, "upon a just construction of the marriage-contract libelled, the pursuer is entitled (except in the case therein expressly excepted) to a free yearly jointure or annuity out of the funds and estate of her late husband, of such an amount as, along with what she may draw from the Bombay Military Fund, shall make up an annual allowance of £365," and that for her life, whether she marries again or not. The question proposed for our opinion is, whether the interlocutor ought to be adhered to.

We have read the marriage-contract carefully. We do not find that there is expressed in it any obligation for a specific annuity of £365, to proceed either from the Bombay Fund or from any other source. The contract appears to be framed on a different principle.

The funds brought by the lady are secured in a certain manner for her own benefit; and it was of course foreseen, that, if she should be left a widow, she would in all events enjoy the benefits of those provisions.

The husband, however, in consideration of the marriage, and any other benefits given to him by the contract, came under a clear and definite obligation in favour of the wife, which, though it ought to be fairly and liberally interpreted in her favour, cannot be changed into any thing different from what it is, according to the terms employed to express it.

It is clear, that the marriage-contract does not bear any express obligation for the annuity assumed in the interlocutor. But it is supposed, that, on equity and expediency, it should be presumed that the intention was to make it fixed and secure. We are of opinion, that it was intended to make the annuity fixed and secure, so far as that was consistent with the nature of the only obligation undertaken, or which there is any indication of an intention on the part of the husband to undertake. But we cannot discover any ground in the provisions of the deed for presuming that there was any intention, in the one party or the other, that the annuity should be warranted or guaranteed to be of any fixed amount.

The obligation is simple and clear—"to do and perform all and whatever may be necessary and incumbent upon him as a subscriber to the Bombay Military Fund, to secure to his promised wife, in the event of his predeceasing her, the benefit of the pension or annuity payable from the said fund to the widow of a subscriber, according to the rank which he holds, or shall hold, in the Company's army for the time." This is the main and leading obligation. It binds to a specific duty, but to no precise sum of annuity to be secured by means of it. If the duty be fulfilled, it manifestly rests on the contingency of the amount payable by the rules of the fund, what the annuity shall be. But, if the right against that annuity fund be made secure, that seems to us to be fulfilment of the obligation, so far at least as the above quoted words go.

But the clause of the contract proceeds:—"And failing thereof, or in case the said pension or annuity, from whatever cause, shall not be available to his promised wife, in the event foresaid (her surviving)," saving and excepting the case of her being excluded from the fund in consequence of the possession of separate funds, "then the said John Taylor binds and obliges himself," &c. to pay to his wife surviving him "a clear yearly jointure or annuity, equal to the pension that has hitherto been paid, OR SHALL BE PAYABLE, from the said fund, to the widow of a subscriber holding the same rank in the army, which now belongs, or shall belong, to the said John Taylor at the time of his death," &c. In a subsequent clause, the contract farther declares, that for a provision to his promised wife, Major Taylor assigns to her "the benefit of the pension or yearly annuity to which she may be entitled as his widow from the said fund, and also the benefit of the pension or annuity payable from any other fund to the widow of an officer of his, the said John Taylor's, rank in the service of the said Honourable East India Company, and that agreeably to the rules and regulations of the said fund or funds respectively."

Taking all these clauses together, it appears to us, that the only obligation undertaken is to do the acts necessary for securing the widow's right to the pension or annuity which, according to the rules and regulations of the Bombay Military Fund, should be payable to the widow of an officer holding the rank which Major Taylor should last have held preceding his death; with a farther guarantee, that if that pension, whatever its amount might be according to those rules, should from any cause, except one event, become unavailable, that is, cease to be payable, his representatives should be bound to make good an equal annuity according to the same rules.

The clause which is thought to sanction a different construction is that beginning with the words "and failing thereof, or in case the said pension or security, from whatever cause, shall not be available to his promised wife." There are here two things, 1st, "And failing thereof;"—Failing what? Clearly it is, failing Major Taylor's doing and performing what was necessary to secure the pension "payable from the said fund" according to his rank. So far the matter is clear, and can admit of no doubt. It is his failing to pay the subscriptions, and comply with any other rules of the institution affecting him. But if he did do and perform all that was necessary, there was no failure in this point, and his engagement being fulfilled, the alternative provided on such failure could not come into operation, whatever might be the amount of the pension payable according to the state and existing rules of the fund. But, 2. There is another case supposed—"or in case the said pension or annuity, from whatever cause, shall not be available" to the wife. We may not exactly see all the events contemplated, in which the pension might not be available in the meaning of the clause, notwithstanding that Major Taylor has done all that was necessary for securing it. If it be held to be clear that the words cover the event of the widow marrying a second husband, by which, according to the rules she is said to forfeit the benefit for the time, there is at least one clear case in which the words have a precise and very appropriate operation; and we are of opinion, that this is the sound construction. But the first question here stands quite independent of any such difficulty as to the events contemplated. "Shall not be available:" In case what shall not be available? The words are express—"In case the said pension or annuity" shall not be available. Whatever may be the causes contemplated, the thing supposed to become unavailable is the pension payable to the widow of an officer of such rank by the rules of the society, and nothing else. There is not one word of provision as to the amount of such pension; and, therefore, whenever the pension payable to the widows of other officers of the same rank was equally available to the wife under this contract, it seems to us very clear that the case of the pension being unavailable had not taken place, whatever might be the amount thereof.

It must be observed that the deed contains no determination of the pension as fixed in amount at any particular time, or at the death of Major Taylor. We understand the principle of the fund to be different, and that the pensions may rise or fall after the officer's death, according to circumstances. And the obligation of this contract is framed accordingly in perfectly indefinite terms. In the first binding words there is nothing said of the time of Major Taylor's death; and in the penal or alternative obligation, on failure, or the pension not being available, while the thing to be done is again simply to secure "a jointure or annuity equal to the pension that has hitherto been paid, or shall be payable, from the said fund," there is still no reference to any fixed time at which the amount of such pension shall be definitely determined. The words in the first clause "for the time," and those at the end of the last "at the time of his death," evidently refer, not at all to the payment or the emergence of the annuity, but solely to the rank which Major Taylor might hold in the army. It is an annuity equal to the pension which has been or shall be payable to the widow of a subscriber "holding the same rank in the army which now belongs, or shall belong to the said John Taylor at the time of his death." His rank could not vary after his death, and therefore it is defined. But the pension described is that only which might be payable to the widows of subscribers of the same rank; and if in their case it varied in amount, we are of opinion that the pursuer gets all that was provided for her, and all that she could have got if Major Taylor had failed to secure the pension, if she were to receive the pension which is payable to the widows of other subscribers, according to the rules of the society.

—ver, of opinion, that the event of the pursuer entering into a second marriage (which we understand has taken place), whereby, by the rules of the fund, she forfeits, under certain qualifications, the benefit of the pension, must be held to be a case in which the pension has become unavailable in the sense of the contract, and the obligation to pay an equal annuity takes effect. We are of this opinion, because this is a case in which, without any reference to amount, the pension has become unavailable altogether, from a certain cause which must be presumed to have been contemplated; and because, although this arises from a certain rule of the fund, the special exception introduced immediately after the supposition of the pension, from whatever cause, becoming unavailable, viz. "saving and excepting only through her right to and possession of such separate funds as by the rules and regulations of the said fund would exclude her from all benefit thereby," renders the inference inevitable, that, while that was a case in itself, if not excepted, comprehended in the meaning of the pension not being available, the other case, of its becoming unavailable by a second marriage, was also comprehended, and, not being excepted, must bring the alternative engagement into operation. But we are of opinion, that the annuity to be paid as long as the exclusion from the fund continues, can be no more than the amount of the pension payable to other widows of officers of the same rank who have not incurred the forfeiture.

We are, therefore, of opinion, that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary ought not to be adhered to, but ought so far to be altered as to find, that the annuity payable cannot be greater in amount than the pension from time to time payable from the Bombay Military Fund to the widow of an officer of the same rank.

LORD BALGRAY.—I concur in the above opinion, so far as regards the first point, that there is no obligation created by the contract for a specific annuity; but I concur with the opinion of Lord Cockburn as to the point regarding a second marriage.

The cause was this day put out for advising, when

THE COURT, in accordance with the opinion of the majority of the consulted judges, pronounced the following interlocutor:—"The Lords having resumed consideration of this case, with the opinions of the consulted Judges, —Find that the defenders, as executors of the deceased Colonel Taylor, are bound to make up any deficiency in the provision or annuity payable to the pursuer from the Bombay Military fund, arising in consequence of her second marriage, quoad ultra, alter the interlocutor complained of, sustain the other defences, and assoilzie the defenders, but find no expenses due, and decern."

 son, banker in London, on behalf of the company of Stephenson Ld. Moncreiff mington, held a bond for £20,000. To these properties, titles F. ade up by Fraser, as trustee, who from time to time effected the same, drawing in the interim the rents, while the lands d undisposed of. With the prices of the lots first sold he paid ain preferable securities, leaving in his hands a surplus sum of 500 applicable to Stephenson's bond. Of date May 16, 1816, he d from Stephenson a commission and factory, containing ample for uplifting the heritable debts due him and granting discharges, ommission he retained till 1819. During this period he received rices of lands sold £5358, but of this amount he only remitted to ason £3005, leaving altogether a balance untransmitted of £2853.
 drew of rents of the lands £1453, no part of which was account-e Stephenson, making in all £4306. On uplifting the prices of he sold, he granted, as trustee, conveyances to the purchasers, in he set forth that they had made payment of the prices to him "as and commissioner for the said John Stephenson." At the same ever, he entered these prices in the sederunt book as received estate, but, on the other hand, and of the same dates, on the dis-of the account, he wrote them off as paid to Stephenson. In with Stephenson, again, he stated the above mentioned sum ed to pay expenses. He did not, however, so apply

No. 31. Fraser v. Stephenson
 it, but misappropriated it to his own uses. The rents drawn by him, on the other hand, were duly applied to the purposes of the estate. Fraser's accounts with the estate were on two several occasions, 1820 and 1825 audited by the commissioners, without their requiring from him discharges on behalf of Stephenson, of the sums set down in his accounts as paid to that individual, and at these audits the commissioners allowed him to take credit for the sums charged as the expenses of realizing the heritable property, including his own commission. Ultimately Fraser became bankrupt, and was allowed, in 1829, to resign his trusteeship, on which event Mr Archibald Gibson, W.S., was elected trustee in his stead. Additional sums to a large extent were, after 1819, paid to a new commissioner appointed by Stephenson, but not sufficient to discharge his claim, and the prices of the lots last sold not having been yet wholly uplifted, Gibson claimed them for the purpose of defraying the expenses of the sequestration, which had all, including those incurred in disposing of the heritable properties, been paid out of the monies, coming from whatever source, into the hands of the trustee, and by contribution among the creditors. Henry Stephenson again, representing John Stephenson, and the assignees of Stephenson and Remington, claimed these unlifted prices as belonging to them under the heritable bond, not affectable for the general expenses of the sequestration; and to determine their respective claims, a multiplepoinding was raised in name of one of the purchasers.

After considerable litigation, the Court (26th June, 1832) found "that Henry Stephenson, Esq., and the assignees of Stephenson and Remington, are entitled to receive the balance of the price of the lands of Cleugh and others, purchased by the raiser of the multiplepoinding, subject only to the deduction of the necessary expenses, if any, of selling and realizing the prices and proceeds of the lands and other subjects contained in the original bond and conveyance to John Stephenson, in so far as these expenses are not covered by the funds, if any, belonging to the claimants, in the hands of the trustee."<sup>1</sup>

Thereafter a remit was made to an accountant, who reported, that the expenses incurred in regard to the sale of the heritable properties could not in any view exceed 3000 guineas, being greatly within the two sums above mentioned of prices untransmitted and rents unaccounted for to the creditor, amounting together to £4306, for which the trustee was accountable to Stephenson, so that there could be no claim on the part of the trustee for any portion of the prices still unlifted.

To this report objections were given by the trustee, which having been repelled by the Lord Ordinary, who preferred Stephenson, &c. to accountant accordingly, after fully hearing parties, gave in an report, in which he adhered to the view originally taken by submitted the following observations:—

instead of remitting to the heritable creditors the prices which his hands as their factor and commissioner, Mr Fraser retained thereof, for the purpose of making those payments enumerated in notes with them, which form Appendix No. IV. and V. of report, page 9.

Notwithstanding of having thus retained his constituents' money for purpose of defraying expenses regarding the subjects contained therein, he charged those expenses in the general accounts of commissions in the sequestration, and was allowed the same by the others in the audits of his accounts, which took place in the 1810 and 1825.

The prices out of which £2853 was retained, were uplifted by Mr Fraser during the years 1815 and 1816, that is, upwards of three years before the first, and upwards of eight years before the second audit of Mr Fraser's accounts in the sequestration, in which those prices are entered as having been received, and as having been paid away, and in which the expenses now claimed were also allowed as having been disburser or due to Mr Fraser.

The prices of the lands sold which had been recovered, formed the proper and proper fund for payment of those expenses which had incurred in selling the lands and realizing the prices. The commissioner saw that Mr Fraser had recovered those prices; but instead of allowing him to reimburse himself out of the proper fund, they not only refused him to take credit for the total amount thereof, without requiring him to be discharged from him, but they moreover allowed him credit for expenses now claimed, in which are included charges for trustees' commission, to the extent of £1367, 19s. 6d. exclusive of interest.

It appears to the accountant that neither was there any call on the purchasers or creditors to advance those expenses to Mr Fraser out of their personal funds, nor was there any propriety in their doing so years before the proper fund for payment of them had come into his hands. In the advance or payment made to Mr Fraser of his commission, to the extent of £1367, 19s. 6d. exclusive of interest, seems to have been uncalled for. Before voluntarily making such payments, the purchasers ought surely, in the view of recovering them from the trustee at a distant period, to have held some communication required what had become of the prices, and why they

No. 31. had not been applied to their proper purposes. These precautions were neglected. Mr Fraser's accounts were passed and docqueted by the commissioners without enquiry as to the prices. And in January, 1829, the creditors accepted Mr Fraser's resignation, and a new trustee (Mr Gibson) was appointed.

Nov. 24, 1836.
Gibson v.
Stephenson.

"In such circumstances it does not appear to the accountant that the creditors are entitled to recover the advances made by them without giving credit, 1st, For the sum retained by Mr Fraser on that account; and, 2d, For rents accounted for to them. According to this view, the heritable creditors would fall to be preferred on the fund in medio."

The trustee again gave in objections, contending mainly that Fraser being Stephenson's commissioner and attorney, and he having not only acknowledged in his conveyances to the purchasers' receipt of the prices in that character, but having also entered these in his accounts with the estate, on the discharge side, as paid to Stephenson, he must be held to have intromitted with these not as trustee, but as Stephenson's commissioner, and to have discharged the estate of all claim on the part of his constituent, who must consequently bear the loss arising from the misapplication of his funds by his own commissioner acting in that character.

LORD GLENLEE.—As far as I understand the matter I agree with the accountant. It is of no consequence in what capacity Fraser got the money from the purchasers. As trustee he was entitled and bound to retain it for payment of the expenses, and in his accounts with Stephenson he stated a sum as so retained. In the trust-accounts again, he charges the whole sum, and states against it the expenses. The Commissioners ought to have asked vouchers. They gave credit to him without asking a discharge; but how can they now claim credit for expenses which their own act and deed, in passing his accounts, shows to be discharged.

LORD MEDWYN.—This is a troublesome and intricate case; but seeing the accountant's report has not altered my opinion. Independent of Fraser's two characters the case is very peculiar. This is a multiplepointing where the trustee brings a claim, and an offset is pleaded that there is more in the hands of the estate belonging to the heritable creditor than the reasonable expenses of disposing of the properties can amount to; and certainly there seems to be a very ample allowance made by the accountant for realizing the estate. As to the rents there can be no doubt, and there should have been no question as to them, and they were chiefly received before Fraser was appointed factor for Stephenson. Then of the prices retained, L.500 arises from payments received in December 1815, before Fraser became factor, though he was the private agent of Stephenson; and indubitably this also must be added to the rents. As to the rest there is a difference, but it does not appear to me to be sufficient to warrant a different view from that taken by Lord Glenlee. Fraser should not have entered these payments in the books of the estate at all. But then how is Stephenson to be affected by these entries? Fraser was then acting as trustee, and Stephenson had no control over them. If there is any impropriety, who is to suffer? Stephenson, with whom every thing is correct,—or the estate? The way Fraser should have acted was this: He should have given a discharge for Stephenson to himself as trustee on the state, just as was done by the new factor in regard to payments subsequently made to them for behoof of their constituent; and if there had been a regular discharge by Fraser when factor, there would have been something more in the case. But there is no discharge by him, and I see no ground to take a different view from that adhered to by this respectable accountant on reconsideration. No. 3

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—As to the rents, they are entirely out of the question; and as to the other matter, I am satisfied we must find that the creditors are liable, from the way in which they allowed Fraser to pass his accounts. They are to suffer and not Stephenson, who had no control over his actings as trustee. Miller.

THE COURT accordingly repelled the objections to the report, and adhered to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, and further found the trustee liable in expenses.

WILLIAM MILLER, S.S.C., factor loco tutoris to Miss Carsina Gordon Gray, a girl of five years of age, presented a petition, stating that she, by the recent death of a paternal uncle, had become presumptive heiress of entail to the estate of Carse, which was worth nett £2000 per annum; Nov. 26,

Miller therefore prayed the Court "to authorize him to purchase an annuity, for the purpose of maintaining and educating the said Carsina Gordon Gray, during the period of her expectancy, at a price payable upon the succession of the estate of Carse opening to her, by the death of the present heir of entail, in case she shall survive him; and further, to effect an insurance on the life of the minor, either simply or against the life of Mr Gray, to the extent of £2000; and to assign the future rents of the estate of Carse, from the period of the succession opening to the minor, and also the policy of insurance, in security of the price of the annuity to be so purchased;<sup>1</sup> or to give the petitioner such instructions as to your Lordships shall seem just and proper."

A remit having been made to an accountant,* he reported that he had applied to a reversionary insurance office, and they had agreed, either, 1st, "To give an annuity of £200 to the minor, payable during the joint lives of her and her grandfather, the heir in possession, half yearly, and beginning the first payment at entering into the transaction, in consideration of the capital sum of £3440, 7s. 8d., payable at the first term after the death of the heir in possession, in the event of the minor surviving that period;" or, 2d, "To grant the said annuity of £200 to the minor, in consideration of their receiving a reversionary annuity of £238, 7s., payable half yearly, during the life of the minor, after the death of her grandfather, in the event of her surviving him, beginning at the first term, half a year after her grandfather's death." The reporter stated that he considered the offer so made to be reasonable and fair, and, in the ninth article of his report, he "humbly submitted his opinion, that it would be expedient to authorize the petitioner to accept of the offer of the reversionary company above referred to, and to grant a security over the rents of the entailed estate of Carse, which may become payable to the minor during her life, after her accession to the estate, of an annuity to the reversionary company, not exceeding £238, 7s., upon the company securing to the petitioner, for behoof of the minor, an annuity of £200 during the joint lives of her and her grandfather, both annuities being payable in terms of the said offer."

The petition and report were then taken up by the Court.

HIS CREDITORS, Respondents.—Sol.-Gen. Cunningham—Patton.

Bankruptcy—Discharge.—In an application for a discharge under the 61st section of the Bankrupt Act, Held, (1.) That contingent creditors must be compared, along with other creditors, in estimating the concurrence of the four-fifths; and, (2.) That, where a petition was presented, and intimated, before the requisite concurrence was obtained, its original incompetency was not cured, by subsequently obtaining the requisite concurrence: and petition accordingly refused.

It is provided by § 61 of the Bankrupt Act, that, "after the period assigned for the second dividend, it shall be lawful for the bankrupt, with concurrence of the trustee and four-fifths of the creditors in number and value, to apply to the Court of Session by petition, praying that he may be held as finally discharged," &c.; and that, after due intimation, and a lapse of three calendar months, the Court shall resume the petition and dispose of it. In April 1836, after the lapse of the period assigned for the second dividend in the sequestration of Michael Gilfillan, writer and insurance broker in Glasgow, he presented a petition purporting to be with concurrence of the trustee, and of four-fifths in number and value of his creditors. The relative certificate by the trustee bore, "that in my opinion the said Michael Gilfillan has obtained the consent of upwards of four-fifths in number and value of the creditors, &c., but excluding the creditors whose claims have been ranked contingently. Should it, however, be found by the Court, that the creditors who have been ranked contingently ought to be counted in number and value, in that case the

llan v. His itors.

The petition was remitted to the Lord Ordinary on the Bills in vacation, with power to grant the discharge if he should see cause. Appearance was made to oppose the petition on the ground that there was not the requisite concurrence of creditors, because it was necessary to compute contingent creditors, and if this was done, the trustee's certificate bore that there was not the requisite concurrence.

The Lord Ordinary, “ In respect it appears, from the certificate by the trustee on the sequestrated estate of the petitioner, that the petitioner has not obtained the concurrence of four-fifths of the creditors in number and value as required by the statute, refused the prayer of the petition, in hoc statu, and decerned ; found no expenses due.” *

Gilfillan procured additional consents from other creditors, and a fresh certificate from the trustee, that he had now the proportion of four-fifths of the creditors, including all contingent claims. He presented a reclaiming note to the Court against the judgment of the Lord Ordinary, and prayed the Court to grant his petition.

Appearance was made to oppose it, on the ground that it had been at first incompetently presented to the Court, as it was required by the statute that there must be a concurrence of four-fifths of all the creditors, before the bankrupt was entitled to present his petition to the Court. It was therefore an incompetent petition which had been presented and intimated, and the Court could not now grant it.

No attempt was made by Gilfillan to dispute the finding in the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary that contingent creditors required to be computed. But he pleaded that the original defect had been cured by the subsequent consents.

LORDS BALGRAY, GILLIES, and MACKENZIE, were unanimously of opinion that the petition was incompetently presented, and that its prayer must be refused.

The LORD PRESIDENT was not present.

THE COURT refused the prayer of the note, and awarded the expenses incurred in the Inner-House against the petitioner.

* “ NOTE.—The Lord Ordinary concurs with Mr Bell in thinking, that ‘ contingent creditors must be included in ascertaining the four-fifths required by the act to sanction the petition. The vague expressions used in the 24th section, cannot be so construed as to deprive a contingent creditor of his right to take part in this important measure.’

“ No expenses have been found due, because the Lord Ordinary is not aware that this point has received the judgment of the Court.”

Nov. 28,
Waddell v.
Waddell.

Alimentary Fund—Assignment.—Circumstances in which, held, in a competition upon the arrears of an alimentary annuity, that a first assignation thereof, was preferable to a second, where there was as strong ground for presuming the assignation to have been made for an alimentary debt, in the first case as in the second; and farther, that the first assignee was preferable to the cedent.

THE late John Rymer of Cliftonhill, by his deed of settlement, bur- Nov. 26, 1
dened these lands with a provision to his daughter, and also with a sum 1st Divis of £4000 to his grand-daughter, Elizabeth Rymer, “in liferent, for her L4. Fuller liferent use allanarly, and to the heirs of her body, equally among them, 8.
in fee.” It was declared “that the said provisions in favour of my daughter and grand-daughter foresaid, shall in no respect be subject to the jus mariti or right of administration of any husband or husbands whom they may marry, nor liable for, or affectable by, their debts or deeds of any kind; the said provisions being intended as alimentary for my said daughter and grand-daughter alone.”

After the death of Rymer, his son, John Rymer, allowed the payment of the interest on the £4000 to fall into arrear, and, in 1824, Elizabeth Rymer, who was then married to Joseph Murray Gilchrist, adjudged the lands of Cliftonhill in security of an accumulated sum of £4835, 10s., being the principal and arrears of interest then existing. They also did ultimate personal diligence against Rymer, junior. In 1826, when the arrears of interest appeared to be about £800, Mrs Rymer or Gilchrist, and her husband, in consideration of an advance of £191 from Peter Adam, writer in Glasgow, assigned him “in and to the lawful interest which is already due, or which may yet become due to us, of the foresaid sum of £4000 sterling, all as contained in the deed of settlement and decree above recited, to the extent of the sum of £191 sterling, and the lawful interest thereof, till payment of it is made or recovered by the said Peter Adam and his foresaids, our lawful cessioners and assignees, in and to the said deed of settlement itself, decrees, letters of horning and cap-tation thereon above mentioned, and decree of adjudication since obtained by us, and all other steps of diligence had by us thereon against the said John Rymer and his estate, to the extent of the foresaid sum of £191 sterling, and interest thereof, foresaid,” &c. This assignation was judicially ratified by Mrs Rymer or Gilchrist, on oath. In 1827, it was assigned to the judicial factor in a ranking and sale which had now been of the lands of Cliftonhill. Gilchrist afterwards died, and his

No. 35. widow married Archibald Douglas Waddell. Peter Adam also died, and Mrs Smith or Adam came to be in right of the above assignation. In 1834, Mrs Rymer or Waddell, and her husband, executed, in favour of William Waddell, W.S., an assignation of the interest which had accrued or should yet accrue on the £4000. This was done on the narrative "that I, the said Elizabeth Rymer or Waddell, and I, the said Archibald Douglas Waddell, are indebted and owing to William Waddell, W.S., the sum of £50 sterling, contained in our accepted bill to him, dated 23d June, 1834, and payable ten days after date, with interest thereon; as also in the sum of £162 for advances made by him to us for the support and maintenance of ourselves and children, and in a business account incurred by us to him," &c.; and that he was then in the course of making farther alimentary advances to them.

The lands of Cliftonhill having been sold, an interim sum of £700 was set apart, in the ranking, on account of the debt due to Mrs Waddell; and in consequence of various claimants competing on this fund, a multiplepinding was brought to determine their preferences.

William Waddell, W.S., stated that his advances, both before and after the date of his assignation, had either been made in small sums from week to week, for alimentering Mrs Waddell and her husband and family; or consisted of a charge for professional employment, in vindicating, in Court, the alimentary fund itself. All these were equally alimentary debts, and part of them was specially narrated to be so, in the assignation; and as the fund in medio was sacred to alimentary purposes, he ought to be ranked preferably to any common creditor, such as he alleged Peter Adam, the cedent of Mrs Smith or Adam, to have been.

In support of this claim, and also as claiming a preference over Mrs Smith or Adam, Mrs Waddell and husband claimed the fund, as being of a strictly alimentary nature, and absolutely unalienable to any but an alimentary creditor. She alleged that the assignation to Peter Adam had been granted for a debt of her first husband, Gilchrist; and as its narrative bore that it was granted "for a sum paid to us," it must be presumed to have been for money received by the husband. The assignation of an alimentary fund, to pay such a debt, was ineffectual; and Mrs Waddell's ratification could not alter the inherent character of the fund.

Mrs Smith or Adam alleged that the advances made by her cedent, Peter Adam, were altogether of an alimentary nature. Several years had elapsed prior to their date, during which the alimentary annuity had run heavily into arrear; and as no explanation had been given by Mrs Waddell, how she had been enabled to subsist during that period, and as no other creditor for that period was in the field, there was sufficient real evidence that the money of Peter Adam had been truly advanced for alimentary purposes. After his death, and so long an interval, no farther proof could be required. Nor was there any thing in the style of the assignation at variance with this. And, separately, even if it were ordinary debt, still as the assignation applied only to arrears of interest, and as it had been duly ratified by Mrs Rymer, it formed an effectual conveyance to the assignee, who, being first in point of time, was preferable to William Waddell; especially as he adduced no sufficient evidence that his debt was of an alimentary nature.

The Lord Ordinary "preferred the claimant, Margaret Adam or Smith, primo loco, in respect of the intimated assignation of the 25th of April, 1826, to the extent of £191 sterling, and decerned in the preference for payment of said sum against the raiser accordingly, and with interest thereon from said date." *

No. 35.

Nov. 28, 1835
Waddell v.
Waddell.

* "NOTE.—By the deed of settlement of John Rymer of Cliftonhill, of 20th March, 1813, the claimant, Mrs Rymer or Waddell, was entitled to the liferent of the sum of £4000, heritably secured on the lands of Cliftonhill and others, belonging to the disponent, her father; and the Lord Ordinary holds, that the terms of that settlement are sufficient to confer on that liferent the character of an alimentary provision.

"At the date of the adjudication obtained by the claimant, Mrs Elizabeth Rymer, in 1824, there was due an arrear of interest of £335, 10s., and no further payment of interest appears to have been made until that which appears to have given rise to the present competition. A process of ranking and sale having been brought of the lands of Cliftonhill, a payment of £700 was made very lately, under the authority of the Court, to Mrs Elizabeth Rymer or Waddell, and her husband, under conditions which made it necessary to raise the present multiplicity, for the purpose of ascertaining the rights of various competitors in regard to said payment.

"The payment, it will be observed, is quite general. Having been made, however, in the terms of the interlocutor in the ranking, and the minute there referred to, as a payment 'of the debt due to Mrs Elizabeth Rymer or Waddell,' it must be held, and seems to be admitted by all parties, that it was a payment to account of the interest due on the above mentioned sum of £4000, heritably secured on the lands; the yearly interest thereon, or annual alimentary provision, is £300; and even supposing the claimant, Mrs Waddell or Rymer, entitled to apply this payment, to that amount, to the current aliment of the year during which the payment was made, there would remain £500, which must be considered as a general payment to account of the arrears of aliment outstanding from the year 1823. Of this, £191 is claimed by Mrs Adam or Smith, in virtue of an assignation granted by Mrs Rymer, with the consent of her then husband, dated April 7, 1826, and intimated to the judicial factor on the estate of Cliftonhill, in April following. This claim is opposed by William Waddell, founding on an assignation by Mrs Rymer or Waddell, dated 16th September, 1834, for behoof of himself and of Mrs Waddell; and by Mrs Waddell, founding on the alimentary nature of the provision, asserting her right to carry off the whole fund: the two latter forming common cause against the former.

"The first point to be considered is, whether, between Mr Waddell, in his own right as a creditor of his cedent, Mrs Rymer, and the other assignee, Mrs Adam, there is any other criterion of preference but that afforded by the respective dates of their assignations; and on that, the Lord Ordinary continues of the opinion expressed in his interlocutor of the 11th July, 1835. It does not appear to him that, in so far as regards the sums said to have been advanced by the claimant Mr Waddell, he is entitled to any preference as an alimentary creditor. An alimentary creditor is understood to be one who has either actually furnished articles, or in description of aliment, or is vested with the right of parties who are the claimant, Mr Waddell, is neither in the one situation

nor the other. The ground of his claim is money advanced to Mrs Rymer self; being, in the first place, the sum of £50, contained in an accepted bill for her and her present husband: secondly, a sum of £162, for advances said to have been made by him to them for support and maintenance of themselves and children; and, lastly, a business account, amounting in all, with interest, to £400. The Lord Ordinary sees no ground for holding the terms of this assignation to confer any right on Mr Waddell as an alimentary creditor. He has no assignment from the parties who made any alimentary furnishings to Mrs Rymer. He merely holds an assignation from Mrs Rymer herself for money advanced to her, and in this particular, stands exactly on an equal footing with Mrs Adam. It is very probable that the money so advanced was expended in alimentary purposes, as the alimentary provision itself was not then tangible; and it does not appear that she had any other source of support. But the same presumption will apply with equal force to the assignation granted to Mrs Adam's author in 1826, and as the rights of the creditors stand in every particular on the same footing, the Lord Ordinary is of opinion, that no preference can be created by the circumstance of the cedent, the debtor, choosing to declare, in the assignation of the later date, that the advances were made for the support of her and family.

“ The other question being that properly arising between Mrs Rymer and the competitor, Mrs Adam, is attended with more difficulty. But the Lord Ordinary is of opinion, that here, too, the latter is entitled to prevail. It will be observed, in the first place that there are here no alimentary creditors, in the proper sense of the term; and, second, that after setting apart the full current year's aliment, the fund in medio consists entirely of a payment to account of arrears of aliment, running from the year 1822. There is no room here, then, for the application of the rule laid down in the case referred to, of Monypenny against Buchanan, 11th July, 1835, in which the competition related to certain successively sums of aliment, and was decided in favour of proper alimentary creditors. The competition here is, in the first place, for arrears of an alimentary provision, and, secondly, it takes place between a creditor who had advanced, in the year 1826, a sum of money on the security of that provision, to which the debtor gave an assignation, and the debtor in that sum of money, who now seeks to carry off the fund, upon the ground that it was not affectable by her own deed. A competition of this kind does not appear to the Lord Ordinary to admit of the application of those rules by which the case above alluded to was determined.

“ Though it may be true that an alimentary fund in one sense, is not assignable, that is, does not admit of being prospectively alienated in consideration of a present advance, it does by no means follow, that when the annual alimentary payments are either allowed to accumulate, or are accumulated in consequence of temporary inability of the debtor to pay them, those accumulations or arrears are not effectually carried by an assignation granted to a party who has advanced money. It is true, that if proper alimentary creditors were competing, they, from the very nature of the fund would be entitled to a preference. But if there be no proper alimentary creditors, one of two presumptions must hold, either that the party holding the alimentary right had funds to support himself independent of the aliment, or, if he had no such funds, which appears to be the case here, that the funds advanced by the assignee were actually applied by him to that purpose. On the first supposition, which implies that the arrears were not necessary for the support of the party holding the provision, even an arrestment would in all probability be held to be good; and on the second, the assignee must, in equity, be held to be an alimentary creditor, and the preference of the creditor over the assignee would involve the most obvious and grossest injustice. The last consideration applies with peculiar force to the circumstances of the present case.

urposes. It is said that this view is contradicted by the terms of the deed, which narrates money advanced "to us," and of which "we acknowledge receipt;" and these terms are said necessarily to imply that the husband is debtor. I do not think this the case. The style of the deed appears good and perfectly well with the statement of Mrs Smith or Adam, that the money was advanced for the alimentary purposes of Mrs Waddell and her husband.

MACKENZIE.—I am of the same opinion. It would have been more correct had the facts been better cleared up, but I incline to think there is no case to justify us in adhering. I am much moved by the circumstance which has just been adverted to, that there is a considerable period of time, during which there does not appear to be any alimentary creditor existing, unless Peter Adam be viewed in that light; and during which there is no visible subsistence of Mrs Rymer or Waddell, unless the £191, advanced by her husband Peter Adam, was applied for aliment. But, besides this, there was a pretty large sum of aliment due at the date of his advance, and I do not see why that would not be competently assignable to any party who advanced the amount Rymer or Waddell. She could have uplifted and discharged the whole sum supposing it to have been tendered to her; and she could have applied the sum uplifted, in paying debts with it; but if so, I think she might equally

In consequence of the embarrassments of the common debtor, the payment of alimentary provision has been suspended since the year 1823. In 1826, the respondent herself proves that she received the sum of £191 from the author of the deed, in consideration of transferring to that extent her alimentary provision. In other words, she obtained, at the expense of the respondent's husband, a sum of money, which she might expend on alimentary purposes: and in the absence of any proper alimentary creditors, it must be held that it was so expended. In these circumstances, it is obviously implied in the claim of preference

THOMAS DYKES, factor loco tutoris to Jean Brown Lamb, presented a petition, stating that the pupil had succeeded to some small heritable subjects in the town of Hamilton, worth about £80 per annum; that the superiors, in some of these were urgent that she should take an entry, and in others she had vassals who threatened her with a tinsel of tinesse of superiority, unless she gave them entry without delay. DAVID BEATTIE, trustee on the sequestrated estate of the deceased John Balfour, presented a petition, stating that the sequestration had taken place in 1816; that Alexander Watson and George Beattie had been successively elected trustees before the petitioner, and had died; that the bankrupt was also dead; that in 1816, Watson and the creditors, in conjunction of a sum of £50, had become bound to convey to one Shand an indiviso half of certain heritable subjects, belonging to the bankrupt; that, in 1820, a disposition was accordingly executed in favour of and by George Beattie, then the trustee; that the subjects had never been disposed by the bankrupt, nor specially adjudged from him to either the preceding trustees, and that a special adjudication from the bankrupt and the preceding trustees, in favour of the petitioner, was now necessary, to enable him effectually to convey the heritable subjects to him. 1st Division.
Ld. Cockburn.

THE pursuer of a reduction, being a bankrupt, was found by interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary not entitled to pursue, except on condition of finding caution for expenses. He procured a cautioner and attestor, but dilatory defences were lodged, which were repelled. The pursuer applied for an order for peremptory defences ; but, as the attestor of the pursuer and the cautioner had become bankrupt in the interim, the defender objected to any order being pronounced at the pursuer's instance, until a new attestor was found, in respect that, by final interlocutor, the pursuer was not entitled to insist on condition of finding caution ; and, therefore, if either the cautioner or attestor became bankrupt, the pursuer could no longer insist until a new cautioner or attestor was found in the room of the bankrupt, otherwise the condition as to caution was rendered nugatory. The pursuer answered, that having once complied with the condition of finding caution, his title to insist was not to be affected by the subsequent bankruptcy of the cautioner :<sup>1</sup> that, even in suspensions of liquid obligations, where a cautioner died or became bankrupt, it was incompetent for the Lord Ordinary to interfere, and it was only the Inner House (A.S. 11th July, 1828, § 118), which could decide whether new caution should be found or not ; and that therefore it was informal, as well as unfounded on the merits, to take an objection before the Lord Ordinary on account of the attestor's bankruptcy.

The Lord Ordinary reported the question.

LORD BALGRAY.—The sole point seems to be this ; was the jus prosecutis allowed to the pursuer, solely on condition of his finding caution for expenses. If so, that condition must be implemented so long as he continues to insist. It was undoubtedly so found by an interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, which became final. In these circumstances, the bankruptcy of the attestor, or the bankruptcy of the cautioner, seems to be just the case in which the defender is entitled to object that the pursuer is without caution, and cannot insist while he continues in that state. As for the section of the Act of Sederunt, it refers to a different class of cases, and I think the Lord Ordinary had jurisdiction to deal

LORD MACKENZIE.—I am of the same opinion. The bankruptcy of the attester is not distinguishable as to this question, from the bankruptcy of the cautioner. In either case I think the defender may object to go on, until the pursuer finds sufficient caution, as he was obliged to do at first.

Circumstances in which a lady, claiming £1000 from her late father's trustees, as a debt due by her father under a verbal promise, whereon her marriage had followed, was allowed to found, as a circumstance of evidence, upon an oath of reference which had been emitted by her father, in an action at her husband's instance against him and his trustees, for payment of the said sum of £1000. 2. In 1806, John Nicolson married Miss Isabella Macalister, daughter of Alexander Macalister of Strathaird. They were put into possession of two farms belonging to Strathaird, and possessed them until 1817, when the parties separated. Mrs Nicolson continued to occupy one of the farms, called Clachamish, after that event. In 1827, Strathaird, who was eighty-two years of age, executed an irrevocable trust-conveyance of his whole estate, and effects in favour of Alexander Hunter, W.S., and Others, for the purpose of relieving himself of the management of his affairs, and paying his debts and certain legacies. At this time Strathaird was claiming in Court, a share of the succession of a deceased brother, Colonel Norman Macalister, which was the subject of a depending Nov. 29, 1871

17. 29, 1836.
Nicolson.

In 1829, John Nicolson raised an action against Strathaird, libelling that, before his marriage in 1806, there were verbal communings “betwixt the pursuer and his own father, on the one part, and the said Alexander Macalister, for himself and his daughter, on the other part: That one of the stipulations and obligations come under by the said Alexander Macalister was, that he should pay to the pursuer the sum of £1000 sterling, as a tocher or portion with the said Isabella Macalister, the pursuer’s intended spouse, bearing interest from Whitsunday 1806 till paid.”

Strathaird, and also his trustee, lodged defences, and a minute of reference to the oath of Strathaird was then put in,—

“1st, Whether, on the occasion of the marriage of the defender’s daughter to the pursuer, and in the course of the communings with the defender relative to that event, the defender agreed and bound himself to pay to the pursuer the sum of £1000 sterling as a tocher or marriage portion, bearing interest from Whitsunday 1806 until paid?

“2d, Whether, after the pursuer had been put into possession of the defender’s farm of Clachamish, and during that possession, the defender allowed the pursuer to retain from the rent the sum of £50 yearly, as interest of the foresaid portion or tocher of £1000?”

In presence of the agent for himself and his trustees, Strathaird deponed, “that there were communings on the occasion of the marriage. Interrogated, whether, in the course of these communings, he promised to give the pursuer £1000 sterling, in name of tocher with the deponent’s daughter? Depones, that he did not; but that he promised to give £1000 to his daughter, for herself and her children. Interrogated, whether he put the pursuer into possession of the farm of Clachamish after the marriage? Depones, that he did so shortly afterwards, and that a fixed rent was agreed upon, but the deponent does not recollect the exact amount. Interrogated, whether he allowed the pursuer to retain £50 per annum out of said rent, as interest of the foresaid sum of £1000? Depones, that he did so for some years, and until the pursuer separated from his wife, when he gave the farm to his daughter, Mrs Nicolson, and that she has been in possession of the said farm ever since the pursuer left it.” Strathaird further deponed, on the interrogation of the agent for his

r the death of Strathaird, which happened in 1832, his trustees

No. 39. husband's instance. An annual abatement of £50 of rent had also been allowed to her husband, while she lived with him, in name of interest that sum of £1000; after the separation from her husband she had been allowed to possess the farm, as in lieu of the interest; besides, the existence of such claim of interest on the sum of £1000 had been specially recognised and acted upon by Strathaird's trustees, in fitting their accounts with Nicolson in his action. The existence of this debt was therefore sufficiently proved; for although the oath could not be founded on, having the effect of an oath of reference in this action, it could competently be founded on as a circumstance of evidence, just as any judicial admission, or any extant letter to a third party, might have been. And if the oath could thus be looked at, its import, along with the other facts and circumstances, was sufficient to establish this part of the claim. The legacy of £1000 was due to her, as the claim of Strathaird to Colonel Macalister's succession had been made good; and Strathaird could not have been meant to impute this legacy in satisfaction of the debt of £1000, because the payment of it at all, depended on the uncertain contingency of success in the litigation as to the colonel's succession. As the sum recovered, of that succession, had borne interest from the colonel's death, the legacy of £1000 must bear interest from the death of the testator.

The trustees answered—1st. That it was incompetent to found on an oath of reference, taken between other parties in a different action. It was especially true, as the oath stated the obligation for the £1000 to have been of a conditional sort; and, had the reference been made in this action, it would have been competent to have got the nature of the conditions explained, and whether they were fulfilled or not. Possibly it might have been explained, that the demand of the claimant was already satisfied. The oath, therefore, should not be referred to at all, and without it, there was no evidence of the alleged debt of £1000; as the sum of accounts in the former action was of no import, or avail, when disconnected from the oath. 2d. The legacy of £1000 must have been held to be granted on satisfaction of the obligation for £1000, if any such obligation was held to exist; and both sums, therefore, were not due. And in any event, no interest should be allowed to run on the legacy until it was paid, as the trustees had not till then recovered payment of the share of Colonel Macalister's succession, the fund out of which the legacy was to be paid.

The Lord Ordinary “found that the fund in medio consists, first, of the sum of £1000 sterling, undertaken to be paid by the truster, the late Colonel Macalister, to the claimant, Mrs Nicolson, on the occasion of her marriage, with interest from the 6th day of April 1832, the date of the death of the late Mr Macalister; and secondly, of the sum of £1000 sterling bequeathed by the said late Mr Macalister to the claimant, also with interest from the date of his death, under deduction of the rent of .

sterling per annum for the farm of Clachamish, payable by the claimant for the said farm from the period of her father's death, in terms of the trust-deed; and found the said claimant entitled to her expenses in this discussion." * No. 39.
Nov. 29, 18.
Hunter v.
Nicolson.

Strathaird's trustees reclaimed.

LORD GILLIES.—The first question is, whether the existence of the debt of £1000 is proved or not. In proof of this debt, the oath of reference in the former action between the claimant's husband and her father, Strathaird and his trustees is founded on, as showing, along with other circumstances of real evidence, that Strathaird had given a verbal promise of the sum of £1000, and that marriage had followed on it, so as to make the obligation binding and irrevocable. I think it competent to look at the oath to that effect; certainly it is no oath of reference as in this case, nor can it be so founded on. If it could, the only question left for the Court would simply be, quid juratum est? For that is all which is left, after an oath of reference is made. But though not possessing the conclusive force of an oath of reference, it may still be founded on, along with the other evidence in the case, and the question remains for the Court to decide, whether, on the whole evidence, they are satisfied that the existence of the obligation is proved. It would, I think, be unjust and contrary to the rules of evidence to hold that the claimant was absolutely barred from looking at the oath, or founding on it to any effect. Suppose that the claimant and her husband had had a family whose legitimacy was called in question; surely the children could not have been prevented from refer-* "NOTE.—The question between these parties, though raised in the form of a discussion of the fund in medio in a multiplepoinding, truly regards the amount of Mrs Nicolson's claims against her father's trust-estate. The only one of these which appears to be seriously disputed, is that for the debt of £1000, alleged by Mrs Nicolson to have been contracted by her father upon the occasion of her entering into her marriage with Mr Nicolson. Considering the terms of the deposition made by the late Mr Macalister himself, in the former action brought against him by Mr Nicolson, in which action the nominal raisers, the trustees, were the parties; and considering that, in the subsequent accounting in that action, credit was actually given by the nominal raisers for the sum of £50 a-year, as the interest on the debt of £1000, the Lord Ordinary must hold the existence of that debt to be sufficiently established. On the other hand, looking at the terms of Mr Macalister's deposition, and the admissions of the claimant, that interest on the said sum, from the date of the marriage till 1817, was included in the former account, and that from that period she was either entirely supported by her father, or permitted by him to possess the farm of Clachamish without payment of rent, the Lord Ordinary thinks that interest on that sum of £1000 must be allowed only from the date of her father's death.

"Holding this debt to be established, there is no room for the presumption, that the legacy of £1000, which was not absolute but conditional, on the event of a litigation depending relative to General Macalister's succession, was intended by the testator as a payment of that debt. It must be considered as a separate legacy; and as, in consequence of the favourable termination of the litigation respecting General Macalister's succession, the nominal raisers, the trustees, have received full payment with interest, the Lord Ordinary thinks they must be liable to the present claimant in interest on the said legacy from the period of her father's ring to this oath as at least a circumstance of evidence to instruct that their parents had been married. The Court could not have shut their eyes to the oath of the grandfather while deciding on the legitimacy of the grandchildren. Supposing then that the oath may fairly be taken into view along with the other evidence of the case, I think the proof of the debt is satisfactory. It is another question whether the debt may by possibility have been paid. But it is not on mere possibilities that the Court can proceed. So far as appears, the debt is outstanding, and it must be so dealt with. There is a second point regarding the interest which should be allowed on the legacy. I think it ought to run from the death of the testator. The fund out of which the legacy was to be paid, was not indeed recovered for two years afterwards, but it was bearing interest in favour of the testator from a much earlier period, and his estate has got the benefit of all that interest. The general rule therefore that a legacy should bear interest from the death of the testator, should apply here.

LORD MACKENZIE.—I am of the same opinion. As to any mere possibility that the debt of £1000 may have been paid, I cannot listen to that in the face of the oath, as it would have been the first thing which Strathaird would have stated when on oath, if he had ever paid the debt. My only doubt arose from this, that I think there is something on the face of the oath as if Strathaird did not look on this in the light of a simple debt unconditionally due by him, but rather as a sum which he had incurred, a species of qualified, and talis qualis obligation, to make good. Now if he did not hold he was under a full legal obligation for the amount, he might very well consider that the legacy of £1000, though conditional on success in an impending law-suit, should satisfy all claim at Mrs Nicolson's instance; and he might so intend it. But though I feel a certain degree of doubt arising from this circumstance, I incline, on the whole, to adhere to the interlocutor, as being the safest which, on the circumstances, can be pronounced. As to the question of interest I have no doubt whatever, and am clear for adhering.

LORD BALGRAY.—I take precisely the same view with Lord Gillies, and have no doubt of its soundness. The oath may be taken into our consideration, along with the other evidence, and I hold that the debt is sufficiently proved. Indeed nothing can be a stronger proof of the principal sum of £1000, being a debt, than the allowance of £50, per annum, in name of interest, for so many years. As to the question, from what date interest should run on the legacy of £1000, I have no doubt it ought to be from the testator's death.

THE COURT adhered, and found the claimant entitled to additional expenses.

No. 40.
 Nov. 26, 1836.
 Finnie v.
 Lords of the Treasury.

In April 1834, Campbell, whilst in England executed his "last will and testament," and on the narrative, that he had conveyed "to my friend William Finnie," and others, "or the survivor of them, or the executors or administrator of the survivor of them, as trustees, all and singular my real and personal property, whatsoever and wheresoever, upon certain trusts therein mentioned, subject to my further direction. Now I do hereby direct that they, the said William Finnie, and others, shall, within six months after my decease, out of any monies which may come into their hands, by virtue of the aforesaid trust-deed, pay the following legacies, namely, to my sister Isabella Douglas the sum of £2000," &c. Other legacies of specific sums, exceeding in all £16,000, were then stated, and certain articles, such as his watch, &c., were also particularly bequeathed. The testator then directed his "trustees or executors, to pay all his just debts, and funeral or testamentary expenses," and farther, "to do all acts necessary to make this a valid testamentary deed." There was no special legacy in favour of any of the trustees and executors.

Campbell shortly afterwards died, and his trustees accepted the office, and were duly confirmed executors nominate. There were almost no debts; but the legacies were more than enough to exhaust the whole moveable estate, and the trustees sold the heritage.* The proceeds of the heritable and moveable estate exceeded £25,000; and after paying all the debts and legacies, there remained a residue of above £5000, which was unappropriated. The trustees raised a multiplepinding, in which appearance was made for the Lords Commissioners of the Treasury, in respect that by 5 and 6 W. IV. c. 58, the crown's right of ultimus hæres had been vested in them. Their Lordships appeared by the Lord Advocate as their Mandatary. The only question arose between them and the raisers, regarding their respective rights in the unappropriated residue.

1. As the trust-deed contained directions to sell the heritage, it must be viewed as moveable, in questions of succession, and thus the whole estate of the deceased was of a moveable nature. The whole of it was dead's part; and by 1617, c. 14, the Raisers, being executors nominate, were entitled to one third of what remained after paying debts; or, at least, as the residue, after paying debts and legacies, was less than such third, they were entitled to retain the whole residue.

2. Prior to 1617, c. 14, executors retained the entire dead's part to themselves, even against the claim of the next of kin, and, a fortiori, against the crown. And as that statute only rendered them accountable to the widow or next of kin, they were not rendered accountable to the

* It was stated at the bar that the Stamp Office received duty upon the whole estate as if it were proper moveable succession, in respect of there being an alleged direction to sell the heritage, which, according to the opinion and practice of the Stamp office, placed the estate in the same position as if moveable.

when sold, which could be introritted with by the raisers qua

ed were more than exhausted by the debts and legacies, both been cut off by a special and substantive enactment.<sup>4</sup> And that ld be liberally interpreted, because the Crown always ex gratia such bona vacantia according to humane considerations on those is of the deceased who had the best claim in equity. In the stance, it was believed that the brother uterine of the deceased een specially mentioned in the will, merely because the deceare done in England where the will was made ; and accordingly bable that his claim to be donatary would be most favourably by the Crown.

conveyance being in trust only, the residue, after satisfying purposes, was unappropriated, and was just in the situation of intestate succession, where there was no heir or next of kin.

those parties were also named his executors : Finds, that on the 26th of April 1834, he executed a last will and testament, containing the purposes above referred to, and consisting of directions to pay his debts, and to pay various legacies there set down : Finds, that neither the trust-deed, nor the last will, contained any appropriation of the residue : Finds, that the said James Mure Campbell, having died on the 21st of May 1834, without leaving heirs or next of kin, the present competition for the residue of his estate has arisen between the above-named competitors in the character of his executors, and the Right Honourable the Lord Advocate, and the Lords Commissioners of the Treasury on the behalf of the Crown : Finds, that the moveable property of the truster is more than exhausted by his debts and legacies, forming a proper burden on such moveable succession : Finds, therefore, that the subject truly in dispute consists of the residue of the heritable estate after payment of the balance of the debt and legacies : Finds, first, that the terms of the trust-deed are not such as to divest that residue of its heritable character in regard to succession : Finds, secondly, and separatim, that even if the trust-deed had contained such absolute and imperative directions to sell, as to produce that effect, the residue must still have been held by the claimants, not as part of the moveable succession of the testator vested in them as executors, but as the proceeds of his heritable estate vested in them as trust-disponees : Finds, that in this last character, being the only character in which, in any view, the claimants hold the residue, those claimants are necessarily bound to account, and cannot found upon their alleged rights qua executors, as saved in a question with the Crown under the act 1617, c. 14. Therefore, Repels the claim of the said trustees ; and finds the said trustees liable to account to the other competitors, the Lord Advocate, and the Lords Commissioners of the Treasury on behalf of the Crown : Prefers the said Lords Commissioners to said residue, and discerns in the preference accordingly : But finds no expenses due.”*

* “ NOTE.—Had there been any thing to claim here properly falling under the description of executry of the testator, there might have been room for the question raised on the part of the trustees, whether the right to call executors to account, declared by the act 1617, c. 14, was confined to the wife, children, and nearest of kin, or was available to the Crown, in cases like that which has occurred here. Considering the professed object, and even the terms of that act, the Lord Ordinary is rather inclined to think that its effect was to declare the general responsibility of executors, and to remove that abuse, according to which they had been previously considered and dealt with, as beneficially interested in the succession. Since that statute, certainly, executors have been uniformly treated as merely holding an office, with the right of claiming a third of the dead's part, in so far as undisposed of, as a consideration for their trouble in discharging it ; and, according to this view, the Crown of course would be entitled to the same advantage as the widow, children, and nearest of kin—the only parties mentioned in the statute, probably because they were the parties with whom the question, in all cases, with a very few exceptions indeed, was likely to occur.

Lord Ordinary thinks that both of those assumptions are erroneous. It is not in all cases that may occur, and have occurred, in which a trustor has so clearly expressed his intention that his heritable property should be converted into money, that the legal conclusion that it was to be treated as moveable in regard to succession. Such seems to have been one of the points which, among others, was decided in the case of Dick v. Gillies, 4th July 1828. But the present trust is not of that kind; it is granted for purposes to be named in a separate clause, and it contains a power of sale, from its mode of expression, clearly directed 'to sell all or any part of my lands or estate,' the effect of which does not appear to be taken off by the parenthetical and superfluous expressions, 'who may desire and be required to exercise such powers.' The clause authorizing the trustees to raise up and discharging heritable or personal securities, is in the form of a power, and nothing else. There is no direction to convert his whole property into money, and what is of great importance, there is no appropriation of the residue to any implication that such a conversion was in the trustor's view. No such case has, by his last will, left legacies, which will deeply encroach upon the residue of his estate. But it does not appear to the Lord Ordinary that that circumstance can affect the character of the residue as regards succession. In substance, the present case appears exactly identical with that of a party conveying his land and a trust, with a power of sale for the payment of certain legacies set down in the trust-deed, without any farther direction, a settlement which, though of the effect of creating moveable rights in favour of the legatees, would leave the residue of the estate in regard to the heir; and certainly would not, without some farther and more positive indication of the testator's intention, let in his next of kin. In short, the Lord Ordinary thinks that if the present competition had arisen for the residue of the estate, the heir of the testator and his next of kin, it must have been determined in favour of the former. But 2dly, and even on the supposition that the effect of the trust-deed was necessarily to convert the testator's heritage into moveables, so as to render it descendible to his next of kin in preference to his heir, it does not follow that it would render it executry in the only sense in which it can benefit the trustees. Giving them the full benefit of their construction of the will of 1617, their rights as executors cannot extend beyond that which they took under the will, viz., the proper moveable succession as it stood at the death of the testator. In so far as regards the price of his heritage sold in obedience to his will, they are not executors but trustees, a character necessarily implying a duty of fidelity and the gratuitous discharge of their duty, and which never did.

NOTE.—Had the present case been that which usually occurs between the administrators of the residuary fund of a testator, the expenses under the heads of the Objection disposed of by the above interlocutor, would have been borne by the residuary fund. According to the usual principle, the legatees must have received their legacies, while the expense of management has fallen on the party whose interests, being residuary, were, agreeably to the presumed intention of the testator, postponed to theirs. But the present case involves specialties, which distinguish it in some essential particulars. By Mr Macalister's will, certain parties were appointed trustees for the special legatees, which trustees were entitled to receive instant payment of the legacies and were directed to accumulate the sums while the trust continued, and to pay for them in a particular manner therein mentioned. The intention of the testator, then, clearly was, that from the beginning the administration of these legacies should be separate and distinct from the general execution of the will. By the terms of instructions, of date subsequent to the will, John Macalister, Esq. and Daniel McInnes, two of the persons who had been named guardians and of accounting was here rejected by the special legatees, who contended were entitled, not merely to interest on the legacies, but to the whole tions of interest, as well as of profits, made in the administration of the fund, in the ratio which those special legacies bore to that general fund. As to the accumulation of interest was decided in their favour by the locutor of the Court of 30th June, 1827, and the claim to the share of addition to interest, was determined by the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary of 12th May, 1835, afterwards affirmed by the Court.

“ In these interlocutors it is evidently assumed, that the two gentlemen happen to be executors, acted not only in that capacity, but in the capacities for the special legatees, and were understood to have held and administered in this last character the amount of the special legacies from the death of the testator. Now the 1st, 2d, and 5th heads of the Objection embrace various of expense incurred by those gentlemen before bringing the present action, for the purpose of informing themselves both as to the extent of the rights of the legatees and as to the particular course of legal proceedings which should be adopted in extricating their complicated interests.

“ In these circumstances, it appears to the Lord Ordinary that the case should be treated as a question not between legatees and a residuary fund, but between two parties interested in a cumulo fund in certain proportions; and that the trustees having taken benefit to a large amount by that construction of the interests of the parties, are not entitled to reject it in regard to the expenses incurred in that cumulo administration. It appears to him, then, that the expenses embraced by these heads of the Objection ought to be borne by the parties proportionally to their respective interests in the amount of the fund, of which the division and appropriation gave occasion to these expenses.

“ It has been finally determined by the interlocutor of Court of the 30th June 1827, that the sums due to the legatees must be remitted at the expense of the legatees; and there seems no good reason for applying a different rule to the expenses of the correspondence relative to such remittances. For by the terms of the payments to the trustees for the legatees were to be made in India, immediately on the testator's death, and the interests of those legatees have been borne by them with on the footing of their being entitled to the full benefit of such payments, though from the circumstance of the executors being also trustees, the payments did not de facto take place. Though the correspondence in question, was the correspondence of the agent of the executors, it must be held as a correspondence on behalf of those gentlemen in their character of trustees for the legatees, and is just the correspondence which would have taken place had the money been actually paid to the trustees for behoof of the legatees immediately on the death, and which in that view must of course have been borne by the trust-fund, and not by the residuary fund of the testator.”

No. 43.

Dec. 1, 1836.
Shepherd v.
Grant.

THE late John Leith of Blair, of date 13th November, 1761, executed an entail of his estate. He had three daughters but no son. The eldest, Anna, was married to John Grant, younger of Rothmaise, and at the date of the deed had five sons, John, James, Alexander, Robert, and Peter. The second, Janet, was married to the Rev. Thomas Shepherd, minister of Bourty, and had at the date of the deed four sons, John, Alexander, Robert, and Thomas. The youngest daughter, Margaret, was at this time unmarried. The deed of entail set forth as follows: "Forasmuch as I have taken into my serious consideration, that I have no heirs-male of my own body to represent me, and succeed to my lands and estate, and that I have grandchildren and am desirous that my memory and surname of Leith should be preserved in the persons of my grandchildren and their heirs, therefore, and for certain other onerous causes and weighty considerations moving me, witt ye me, the said John Leith, to have sold, alienated, and disponed, likeas I, by the tenor hereof, from me, my heirs, assignees, and successors, sell, annatlie, and dispone, to and in favour of myself in liferent, and to the heirs-male lawfully to be procreate of my own body in fee; whom failing, to the eldest son living at the time of my decease, procreate betwixt John Grant, younger of Rothmaise, and Anna Leith, my eldest daughter, and to the heirs-male of his body, in fee; whom failing, to the eldest son of Thomas Shepherd, minister of Bourty, procreate betwixt him and Janet Leith, my second daughter, and the heirs-male of his body, in fee; whom failing, to the eldest son lawfully to be procreate of Margaret Leith, my third daughter, and the heirs-male of his body, in fee; whom failing, to the second son procreate betwixt the said John Grant and the said Anna Leith, my eldest daughter, and the heirs-male of his body in fee; whom failing, to the second son of the said Thomas Shepherd, procreate betwixt him and Janet Leith, my second daughter, and the heirs-male of his body; whom failing, to the second son lawfully to be procreate of the body of Margaret Leith, my third daughter, and the heirs-male of his body, in fee; whom failing, to the heirs-male of my said first, second, and third daughters, in the same order of succession: All whom failing, to me, my nearest heirs and assignees whomsoever: But with and under the express provisions, restrictions, reservations, clauses irritant, and others after-mentioned, All and Haill, the town and lands of Nether Blair," &c.

This deed contained the usual limitations, in setting forth which, the parties against whom they were directed, were indiscriminately described as "the said John Grant, my grandson, or any of the heirs of tailzie," or as "the eldest son of the said John Grant (his daughter's husband), and the other heirs and members of tailzie;" and in a subsequent deed, executed in 1763, containing provisions to his daughters, Mr Leith, with reference to his landed estate, of which his eldest daughter Anna was to have the liferent, referred to "the fee of the same being some time ago made over to John Grant, her eldest son."

Mr Leith died in the course of the year 1763, and was succeeded by John Grant, eldest son of the eldest daughter. He died without issue in 1769. On this event, John Shepherd, the eldest son of the second daughter, made up titles as heir of tailzie, under the second branch of the destination, and he survived till 1832, when he died, also without issue. The youngest daughter had been married subsequent to the date of the entail, and had had an only son; but he had died in 1794, likewise without issue; so that the first series of destinations in favour of the eldest sons of the three daughters was now exhausted, and the succession opened to the second series, viz. that in favour of their second sons, respectively. Prior to the death of John Shepherd, however, James and Alexander Grant, the second and third sons of the eldest daughter, had died, leaving no children; and Alexander Shepherd, second son of the second daughter, assuming that the estate had now fallen to him, made up titles as nearest heir of tailzie to his brother, and possessed it till his death in February, 1836. He having left no issue, a competition ensued between James Shepherd, W.S., the eldest son of Robert Shepherd, third son of the entailer's second daughter, and Robert Grant, the fourth son of the eldest daughter. These parties accordingly took out competing brieves, which having been brought by advocacy into this Court, a record was made up, and the cause reported by the Lord Ordinary, on cases, to the Court.

No. 43.
Dec. 1, 1836
Shepherd v.
Grant.

Pleaded for Shepherd—

1. The deed of entail makes special reference to the “grandchildren” of the entailer, as being in life at its execution; and the true construction of the destinations in favour of the first and second series of heirs (especially when taken in connexion with the mention nominatim of John Grant, the eldest son of the eldest daughter, in the clauses of limitation, and in the deed 1763), is that the first and second sons existing at the date of the deed, (subject to an exception as to the eldest son of the eldest daughter alive at the death of the entailer), were individually, though descriptively called in their order; or, at all events, that the first and second son respectively intended, were such as should hold that character at the date of the entailer's death, and not at the opening of the succession.

2. That the destination posterior to the series of second sons, and in favour of the “heirs male,” of the entailer's “first, second, and third daughters, in the same order of succession,” had reference not merely to the relative seniority of the daughters, but to the order of succession adopted in the previous series as to their first and second sons, so that this destination would carry the estate to a separate series of third sons and then fourth sons, &c., of the several daughters respectively. Then, on this construction of the destination, as the eldest son of the third daughter had failed, and as James and Alexander Grant, the second and third sons of the eldest daughter had survived the entailer, and had now both also

No. 43. failed, and as there was no second son of the third daughter, the succession had opened to the representative of Robert Shepherd, the third of the second daughter, who was entitled to take before Robert Grant, the fourth son of the first daughter.

Dec. 1, 1836.
Shepherd v.
Grant.

Pleaded for Grant.

1. It is not admitted that Alexander Grant, the third son of the eldest daughter, was alive at the death of the entailer; but, assuming that he was, it is obvious that, in determining who is the person holding the character of eldest, second, or third son, and entitled to succeed in such character, on the succession opening to that series of heirs, that party must be taken to whom the character belongs at the time when the succession so opens. This was expressly decided in the Roxburghe cause, where the heir-male of a fourth daughter was held entitled to take under a destination to the eldest daughter and her heirs-male, as standing in the character of eldest daughter at the time when the succession opened under that destination, and accordingly here, the two intermediate brothers having predeceased before the succession opened to the series of second sons, Robert Grant then held the character of second son of the eldest daughter, and was entitled to the estate in preference even to Alexander Shepherd, who had been improperly served heir without his knowledge, and consequently still more is he now entitled to succeed before the third son of the second daughter, even on the assumption that the destination truly calls for a series of third and posterior sons in the same way as is provided as to a series of first and second sons. But,

2. The concluding destination is not of that nature at all. It is similar to the "heirs-male" of the respective daughters "in the same order of succession," which can mean nothing more than in the order of seniority of the daughters, the heirs-male of the first daughter succeeding after the series of second sons is exhausted, in preference to those of the second daughter, and the heirs-male of the second before the heirs-male of the third. Even assuming, therefore, that the whole series of second sons is exhausted, and that Robert Grant is only to be viewed as holding his original character of fourth son of the eldest daughter, still as her heir-male under the last destination entitled to succeed prior to any heir-male of the second daughter posterior to her first and second sons; consequently he is in this view, equally as in the other, preferable to Shepherd, who represents only the third son of the second daughter.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK, after reciting the facts, proceeded—The question comes to be, what is the construction of the destination? It appears to me perfectly clear that the testator, by using the words eldest son, second son, &c. contemplate nothing but the character of first or second at the time the succession opened to them. It is a settled point, that when a party leaves an estate to his first, second, third, or other son of a person named, that individual will succeed and enjoys the character when the succession opens, and if ever there was a point liberately decided, that point was so in the Roxburghe cause. There the case intended to individualize them, it would have been the easiest thing in the world to have specified them. As to the eldest son of the eldest daughter, he arises the one who should be institute as the eldest son living at the time of the decease. That is the commencement of the series, but there are no such words in regard to any other substitute. It is said on the part of Mr Shepherd that we must supply that. We can do nothing of the kind, as that would be a new deed, and, therefore, there is a total want of evidence on the face of the document of any intention to individualize them, and the fact that they were in life tends to prove that he did not mean to do so. I cannot arrive at the conclusion contended for by Mr Shepherd, even taking the most unfavourable view for Mr Grant and considering the case to be under the second branch of the destination. But that is not all. There is a remainder, after providing for the eldest and second sons of the three daughters, in these words, "whom failing, to the eldest son of my said first, second, and third daughters, in the same order of succession." Then under these words it cannot be doubted that Mr Grant, as heir of the body of the eldest daughter, must succeed before the son of the third daughter, the second daughter. I do not need to go back to the case of Linplum, as Mr Grant is heir-male of the body he is certainly heir-male whatsoever, and it is Mr Grant that must be preferred.

D GLENLEE.—I agree with your Lordship. Mr Grant might have reduced the service as erroneous, and the question brought before us really is whether he is heir-male of the eldest daughter. It is plain all the second sons of the daughters Mr Grant are out of the way, and after that it is the heir-male of the eldest daughter that is to succeed, and in that character he is clearly entitled to it. It is too plain for argument.

D MEADOWBANK.—I am of the opinion expressed by Lord Glenlee. It is unnecessary to say what would have been the decision if the question had arisen under the first branch of the destination, though if driven to it I would have agreed with your Lordship that we were to judge of the character of the party claiming under it as at the date of the succession opening. But the question is

No. 43. daughter, and under that destination his right is unquestionable, there being second son of any of the daughters remaining.

2D DIVISION.
Lord Jeffrey.

THE defenders in this process, who were professional men, were examined as havers under a diligence at the instance of the pursuer. The examinations having lasted several days, they craved expenses there by incurred on account of time and trouble in going over books, paying clerks, &c., whereupon the Lord Ordinary reported the question, whether, having been called as havers, these parties were entitled, pendente processu, to have their expenses allowed them?

The Dean of Faculty, for the Pursuer, resisted the demand, and maintained—This case is attended with specialties. If the defenders have chosen to deny a certain fact, and we recover from them, under a diligence, documents which disprove their allegation as to this fact, they are not entitled to expenses for the time spent in searching out those documents. This claim must abide the issue of the cause, for before it can be entertained, the opposite party and the Court ought to see the depositions which are not before them, and ascertain whether unnecessary depositions had not been caused by the parties under examination.

M'Neill and Anderson, for the Defenders, replied—Having been examined as havers the defenders are entitled to their expenses,<sup>1</sup> more especially as they are professional men. The question is whether the defenders are to bear a part of the expenses of the pursuer, who has called them as havers and ought to pay them as such, his claim for the expenses so far out being reserved entire, in the event of his gaining the cause; having used the defenders' documents, and put them to expense, he is not entitled to refuse this demand.

the year 1829, the suspender Murison carried on the business of a

Dundee, with which he had not entered, presented a petition to the magis-

 Murison v.
 Tailors of Dundee.

As Murison still continued, notwithstanding the interdict, to carry on trade as a tailor, the corporation, in July following, presented an application to the Sheriff of Forfarshire, praying for interdict of new and damages for encroachment on their privileges from the date of the magistrates' decree. In the course of the proceedings following thereon, without admitting that the former essay-piece had been properly rejected, Murison declared himself willing to enter with the corporation, and offered to perform a new essay, on condition of being allowed "to make a full suit of clothes on his own boards, in presence of neutral essay-masters, besides paying the usual entry money."

Thereafter the corporation presented a supplementary petition to the sheriff (Feb. 13, 1831), with which the former was subsequently conjoined, craving additional damages for further infringement of their rights by Murison, since the date of the application in July. Pending the process, Murison presented a separate summary application to the sheriff, stating, inter alia, the offer above mentioned, and praying to be admitted to the privileges of the corporation on his paying the dues of entry, and "complying with any other rules, as he has proposed, or the sheriff shall deem reasonable." The sheriff remitted to the essay-masters of the corporation to take trial of his qualifications under the same conditions as the first essay-piece had been performed. Murison not complying with the remit, the sheriff decided against him with expenses; and of this judgment he brought an advocacy.

Meanwhile a record was made up in the conjoined processes of interdict before the sheriff at the instance of the corporation, Murison averring, inter alia, "that he was, at the date of the first essay, and now is able to work with his own hands as a tailor, and that he has cut and made and can cut and make clothes, so as should entitle him to admission." A proof was allowed, but before it was concluded or an interlocutor on the merits pronounced, the process was advocated ob contingentiam of those previously mentioned. The Lord Ordinary (Corehouse) repelled the reasons of advocacy in all the processes, with expenses, adding the subjoined note.* His Lordship's interlocutor was acquiesced in, and the process at the

* "There are three advocations with regard to this matter. In the advocacy of the conjoined actions at the instance of the corporation before the Magistrates of Dundee, it is clear from the advocator's admissions, that he has violated the privileges of the corporation to a great extent, both before and after the interdict; and the interlocutor of the magistrates brought under review seems well founded in every respect. If indeed the advocator had persisted in the plea maintained in the cases before the sheriff, that the tailors are not a corporation, it might have been necessary to advocate this case, and to have sisted process until the fact was determined; but the advocator abandoned that plea at the bar. In the action at the advocator's instance before the sheriff, the Lord Ordinary thinks that a dress coat is a reasonable essay-piece, and therefore that the sheriff's interlocutor is well founded. In the conjoined actions at the instance of the corporation, no interlocutor upon the merits has been pronounced, having been advocated ob contingentiam. It

Dec. 2, 1836.
 Murison v.
 Tailors of Dundee.

The corporation answered :—

1. No illegal or unwarrantable qualities were adjected by the respondents to the complainer's proposal to become a member of the incorporation ; and, moreover, his aptness or otherwise to exercise the tailor craft, is altogether irrelevant to the only questions raised under the present process.

2. It is res judicata that the respondents were entitled to demand performance by the complainer of an essay-piece, and that the conditions they imposed were reasonable and fair ; and the complainer has, in the subsequent proceedings, admitted by implication the insufficiency of his essay in March 1830.

3. Under all the circumstances of the case, and in particular, as the infringement of the exclusive privileges of the corporation by the complainer was continued in violation of an interdict, and in respect also of the great extent to which he carried on the trade of a tailor, the proceedings against him by the respondents were neither nimious nor oppressive, nor the damage awarded excessive, but, on the contrary, much less than his gain by the illegal proceedings.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor, adding the note subjoined : *—“ Finds, 1st, That there is nothing in any of the suspender's judicial statements, in his former processes with the chargers, or * “ The chargers made a strong effort to have the proof taken, with their own assent, before the Sheriff, as to the essay-piece in March 1830, thrown aside as irrelevant, upon the pretext that the suspender had substantially admitted the insufficiency of that essay, by afterwards (in March 1831) applying to be allowed to perform another, upon terms and conditions, which have since been found inadmissible. The first, and a conclusive answer to this is, that there is no plea in law to this effect on the record ; a second answer is, that the fact of such application having been made by the suspender, was fully known to the chargers long before the proof in question was taken or allowed, in spite of which they not only allowed it to go on without protest or objection, but took part in it, and argued upon its import, as an important element for the decision of the cause, up to the debate before the Lord Ordinary. But even if it was still open to them to insist in this objection, the Lord Ordinary is of opinion, that it is entirely groundless in itself. The suspender not only never admitted that his essay-piece had been justly rejected, but on the contrary, uniformly maintained, that it was perfectly sufficient, and ought to have been so reported by the triers for the incorporation. After this last process was instituted, and when he had offered, and been allowed to prove the sufficiency of that essay, he did indeed, with a view to save the delay and expense of such a proof, offer to perform another, upon certain conditions ; and the Sheriff, and afterwards the Lord Ordinary, found, that he was not entitled to insist on those conditions. But this was merely rejecting a tentative or alternative method of making out his case ; and, when it was rejected, he naturally fell back upon that which he had originally suggested ; and went on with his proof without inconsistency, or objection from the respondents ; and comes now, quite competently, to ask judgment upon its import and legal effect.

“ Upon that, the Lord Ordinary will not enlarge. He thinks it sufficiently proof 'the accuracy necessary in measuring the chest' (the neglect of ver, is stated on the same authority, 'to lead infallibly to a misfit,' a in this instance appears not to have followed), and that the sewing did ery workmanlike. But 3dly, It is completely proved, that the sus-ediately after this essay-piece had been executed, began openly to trade in his own person; and was in the practice, from that time con-the date of the proof, to measure, cut out, and sew up, with his own article of dress for his customers; and that in such a sufficient mane them satisfaction, and increase the resort to his establishment; and y appear that he worked more slowly, and set about some of the ope-clumsily than one bred to the craft from his childhood; yet the mere aving so wrought, not once or twice, as a mere strained proof or exhifitness, but regularly, privately, and profitably, in the ordinary course me, does appear to the Lord Ordinary the most conclusive of all proofs, really that aptness and ability for the trade, which it was the only arpose of the essay-piece to put to the test; and those very operations e chargers have been found entitled to damages, being performed by ossible, indeed, to look at the history of this case, without a strong hat the whole proceedings of the chargers towards the suspender, have of a harsh and vindictive character. They have already obtained, and actual, an award for no less than L.40 damages, for his working a few ions to the essay of March 1830, and have actually recovered a sum of L.160 of expenses relative to that period, and to his subsequent offer

ay. The effect of these litigations, too, has been entirely to break up er's business as a clothier and merchant, as well as a tailor, and to drive ds of two years ago, from the town of Dundee; he having, during that n reduced to 'carry on the trade of a bone-grinder in the village of Such was the relative situation of the parties when the learned Sheriff-in February 1835, assoilzied the suspender from this (third or fourth) of the chargers. But they having craved the judgment of the Sheriffained an alteration of that judgment, and got the decret now charged 50 of additional damages, and £40 of expenses. The suspender offered evidence if the chargers would pass from the damages. But this being out objection, before the Sheriff, in the case now under suspension, upon the ground of res judicata, judicial admission, or otherwise; and also, that interest, as a corporation, must plainly be one or other of those two; first, to increase the consequence and wealth of the corporation, by having the greatest possible number of entrants, paying the highest possible fees of admission; or second, to keep out from a share of these advantages, as many as possible of those who are entitled to admission, if qualified, upon very low or merely nominal fees, or without any payment whatever. From the last of these classes, they may have an interest to exact as difficult an essay-piece as law and justice will allow; but certainly not from the former; and there is room, therefore, to suspect their motives, when they are particularly scrupulous with one of this description. It is more important, however, to consider how the law deals with their right thus to test the qualification of entrants, in cases where they are under the strongest temptations to assert it with severity; and the case of discharged soldiers or King's freemen, affords an apt illustration. Such persons are entitled, without any fees of admission, to practise any trade, 'for which they are apt and able;' and it is the right accordingly of any corporation, whose functions they assume, to question their ability. The limits of this right, however, are carefully considered, and deliberately settled, in the case of M'Kenna, 13th June 1828, and the other cases there referred to; and, though there is no doubt a difference as to the form in which proof of ability or disability may be required in the two cases, it does appear to the Lord Ordinary, that a person coming to the corporation with the full fees of admission as a stranger, in his hands, is substantially in the same situation as to the degree of aptness and ability he must possess, with a King's freeman, claiming to exercise the trade without paying any fees whatever.

"As to the claim of damages, generally, in cases of this description, there is a plain distinction between those in which they arise from a party working without paying the dues of entry, and those in which the full dues have been tendered, and the objection is merely want of sufficient skill or knowledge. In the former, the damage is manifest, as well as the unfair advantage which an individual would have, if allowed to participate in the profits of a trade, for the right of exercising which every one else had been obliged to pay a price. In the latter, the nature or existence of any thing which can be called damage, is far more problematical. The only way in which it is, or can be stated, is that the unskilful party may yet take away a part of the employment which would otherwise come to the better qualified members; and it is upon this principle accordingly, that the damages have been estimated in the present case. But it is obvious, that this source of loss would not be diminished, but increased, by the improvement of the new worker's skill and knowledge; and yet it is the want of such skill which forms his only disqualification. The public may possibly have an interest to keep back such bungling operators; and the corporation may have a legal right to prevent them; but it appears plain, that if the full fees are tendered, they have less interest to exclude such persons, than to exclude more formidable rivals—and cannot therefore qualify any actual damage by their working; always keeping it in view, that it is wholly owing to themselves that they have not the full fees in their pockets, and that the case would be exactly the same, if they had been consigned, and ready to be uplifted, at their pleasure.

"The Lord Ordinary would have hesitated, therefore, before he could have sanctioned any award for such a sum as £40 damages, even for that period of the suspender's working, which took place, while he refused to submit to any essay whatever, and insisted on being admitted on the bare payment of the fees. That matter, however, has been finally settled; and the case now to be dealt with refers only to his working after that essay, and on a reserved tender of the entry-money required; and this again turns entirely on the view which should be taken as to the sufficiency of the proof then given of his fitness for the trade. In the Lord Ordinary's opinion, it is not competent to require, on such an occasion, any self to be apt and able to exercise and carry on the trade of a ought to have been then admitted as a member of the said cor-

, and was only excluded from a formal admission thereto, by the the improper refusal of the said chargers; and therefore, and in that the chargers have been already fully paid and satisfied, under mer processes, for any damages and expenses they may have
, by the suspender's working or carrying on the trade of a tailor, he burgh of Dundee, prior to his having executed the said essay-March 1830, suspends the letters and charge simpliciter, and
: Finds the suspender entitled to expenses."

JUSTICE-CLERK.—I have not heard any thing to induce me to alter the tor. There has been no disposition shown, since I have sat here, to rebe rights of corporations; but with reference to the proceedings in the case, the evidence satisfies me that this corporation have acted in regard explainer with a much greater degree of rigidity than they have in re-other individuals. Looking to Lord Corehouse's interlocutor and the proceedings, especially to the acquiescence of this man in the interlocutor great skill or superior expertness; or, in short, of more knowledge of the than is necessary to carry it on, with a reasonable chance of employment cess. Now, there is no doubt that the suspender did measure, and cut, in a coat in March, 1830; and for a year after that time, did habitually

, and cut, and finish many coats, waistcoats, and trowsers, to the perfect ion of his customers; probably thus putting through his own hands an distinct proof of specific damage, even admitting the evasion of privilege of which he was guilty, this was a higher amount of damages than I ever remember to have been given in such a case ; nor can I recollect, even in cases where an evasion of privilege was proved, that we ever did more than find that the evasion had taken place, and award merely nominal damages. But not satisfied with the corporation go on with the process, and get an interlocutor from the sheriff-substitute, which most accurately subsumes the facts, as well as the real justice of the case. I think that the corporation have had complete and ample satisfaction by the finding in their favour of £40 damages—a finding in which I should have acquiesced, but would have required them to qualify their damage. I agree with the Lord Ordinary that, while corporations exist, they are entitled to retain their privileges ; but they are not entitled to conduct themselves oppressively and rigidly, and to act differently in the case of one from what they do in the case of other candidates for admission to their body.

LORD GLENLEE.—This man states distinctly that he had ceased to work a business of a tailor, in violation of the interdict of the magistrates. It is admitted that he has left Dundee and given up his trade. This brings the interlocutor to one point, and the sole question before us is as to the damages. I am deeply pressed with the truth of the brocard—summum jus summa injuria, and that the conduct of the corporation, in refusing to admit this man, was unjust and oppressive. I say nothing as to the essay-piece, but I agree with the chair and sheriff-substitute, that the complainer ought to have been admitted a member of the tailor's corporation. The respondents, when they bring this claim, are entitled to more than they have already got. How £50 more should be due for the transgressions the complainer has been guilty of since the first finding of damages, it would be difficult to say. There is no evidence of damage incurred in the interim.

LORD MEADOWBANK.—I am of the same opinion. The whole conduct of the corporation in regard to this man has been most vindictive, tyrannical, and malicious. It is one of the instances that occur of oppression in a public body, showing that while individuals, as such, will act with perfect fairness, yet where the interests of a corporation of which they are members is concerned, their conduct will be quite different.

LORD MEDWYN.—I have some difficulty in concurring. It might be difficult if I could agree with Lord Glenlee that there is no evidence of damage having been incurred. But such evidence is extracted from the books of the complainer which show the profit on the clothes made by him between February, 1830, and March, 1831. This is additional profit accruing to him in the face of the interdict by the magistrates. There could be no reason for preventing him going to the sheriff for interdict of new, which it was necessary and competent for him to obtain. Looking to the proceedings in this process, it is manifest the complainer did not mean to found on the essay of March, 1830 ; and indeed he offers to make a new essay-piece. At that time he was held not to be qualified ; he acquiesced in this, and in the present process brings a proof of his qualifications, which applies principally to the year 1831. I cannot therefore agree with the Lord Ordinary.

THE COURT adhered, finding additional expenses due.

Ranking and Sale—Heritable Creditor.—A party purchased a ranking and sale, and obtained a charter of sale and was infeft : after a considerable number of years, he became bankrupt without paying and his estates were sequestrated : a heritable creditor, who was entitled to one-third of the proceeds of the ranking and sale, presented a Bill of Suspension of Interdict to prevent the bankrupt from conveying the lands to his creditors, craving that they should be resold under the ranking and sale which was in dependence ; the trustee stated that he kept the accounts of these lands in the general estate of the bankrupt, and that he was willing to accept of a charter which should declare the conveyance to be “ under the burden of the heritable preferences legally constituted over them : ” —Bill refused, with expenses, in exercise of the statutory right of the trustee to exact a conveyance which could not be given to him the bankrupt's right, tantum et tale as it was in the bankrupt.

The late Mr Glendonwyn sold his estate of Parton and others to his son-in-law, William Scott, by minute of sale. The price of Parton was £1000, which was declared a real burden on the lands. He died without executing any conveyance to Scott, but his three daughters, as co-heiresses, executed a disposition of Parton in favour of Scott, for the full value of the price. Scott took infeftment, and, in 1814, sold a portion of the lands, called Barquhillanty, to John Napier of Mollance, by charter of sale, containing disposition and precept, under which Napier lawfully took infeftment. He also entered into actual possession of the lands.

The price of Barquhillanty was to be fixed by valuers, and, in 1815, Napier raised an action of implement, &c. against Scott, under which the price was judicially fixed at £14,830, and, in 1821, decree was given, declaring the lands sold under burden of that price, and in favour of the Martinmas 1813. In 1817, a ranking and sale of Scott's estates was brought, and Napier, after the price of Barquhillanty was fixed, raised a process of multiplepoinding, to enable him to pay the price in safety. This process was conjoined with the ranking and sale. Another part of the estate of Parton, called Craichie, had been included in the ranking and sale by Napier at a price of £5850 ; and cause was found by him accordingly. He also entered into possession of these lands. In 1822, he obtained a Crown charter of ranking and sale of the lands of Barquhillanty and Craichie.

While the ranking and sale was still in dependence, the estates were sequestrated, and Robert Kemp, writer in Dumfries, the trustee, was directed to execute a disposition of the lands of Barquhillanty in favour of the daughters and heirs-portioners of the late Mr

Glendonwyn, presented a bill of suspension and interdict, craving an order to prevent Napier from executing such conveyance ; or at least to prevent Kemp from retaining possession of the lands, except under the condition of keeping an account of their rents and produce separately from the other funds of Napier, and consigning their amount in the ranking and sale. Lady Gordon and her curator ad litem alleged that Barquhillanty as well as Craichie had been sold under the ranking, and contended that, as the price of neither estate had yet been paid, it was impossible for Napier or his trustee to resell the lands effectually, as they could not give a good title to a purchaser until the price, in the ranking and sale, had been paid :<sup>1</sup> And farther, that as even a full price would fall short of the price and interest due under the ranking, the trustee and the general creditors of Napier had no interest in making up a title to the lands ; whereas Lady Gordon, who was largely interested as one of the heirs-portioners of Glendonwyn, and entitled to a third share of the proceeds realized under the ranking and sale of Scott's estates, had a title to prevent the conveyance to the trustee of Napier, and to insist that the lands should be resold under the ranking. The trustee who alleged that both of the estates had been much ameliorated while in Napier's possession, and that considerable payments to account of the price had been made, answered that it was impossible for Lady Gordon to sustain any prejudice by the proposed conveyance, as it could only transfer to him the heritable estate of Napier tantum et tale as it stood in Napier ; that he had a statutory right<sup>2</sup> to compel the conveyance, and had also an interest to do so, both in order to prevent the risk of any individual creditors completing real securities to his prejudice, and also because a considerable reversion was expected by him to arise from the sale of the lands, which, after paying the price and interest due on the respective estates, would be a fund available to the general creditors. Besides this, the trustee alleged that the lands of Barquhillanty had not been bought under the ranking, but by a private transaction between Napier and Scott ; and that they stood on the same footing as any heritage held by a bankrupt, but affected with real burdens, which the trustee could nevertheless compel the bankrupt to convey to him if he chose, whether the heritable creditor opposed or not.

The trustee also stated, that he kept his accounts, as to these estates, distinct from the other accounts under the sequestration, and that he was willing to accept of a disposition from Napier, specially “ declaring the lands to be conveyed under the burden of the existing preferences legally constituted over them.”

JILLIES.—I think this a very clear case. The conveyance to the trustee

TR.—The trustee’s right (and duty) to obtain a conveyance and title to that belonged to the bankrupt, is statutory and absolute, and cannot or interfered with on any surmise of prejudice to other interests. In there is nothing but a proposal to revive the proceedings in the ranking answer is, that the completion of the trustee’s title (he being already in and exclusive administration of the property) will be no bar to such a otherwise advisable. The trustee has already stated that he keeps the of this subject distinct from those of the rest of the estate, and has pledged

JAMES HAMILTON, agent, Glasgow, presented a petition stating that in October, 1836, he had received a charge of horning on a bill of exchange, and that on 22d November he had raised a summons of cessio bonorum under 6 and 7 Will. IV. c. 56; that he had made the requisite intimation in the Gazette and by circulars to his creditors, sent through the post-office, and that he now produced a copy of the Gazette, with certificates as to the transmission of letters, and also executions of citation against such creditors as resided forth of Scotland. He prayed the Court “to grant warrant for his personal protection against the execution of diligence at the instance of any of the foresaid creditors, till the 4th day of February next, or for such space of time as your Lordships shall deem proper—the petitioner always finding caution, before extract, for such penalty as shall be deemed reasonable—all in terms of the statute.”

On November 24th the Court ordered intimation in the minute-book, and special intimation to the creditor who had given the charge of horning. After the period of intimation was elapsed, Hamilton prayed the Court to grant his petition, especially as no opposition was offered.

LORD BALGRAY.—The notice of thirty days required by the statute to be given to creditors before compearing to answer to the summons of cessio, does not elapse before the 22d December. I rather think this petition should be superseded till e 23d. There is another case, that of Kippen, where a similar application was made, and an objection was taken to the competency of it, on which minutes of debate have been ordered to be laid before the whole Court. In these circumstances, as the competency of such an application as this is doubtful at present, it should be superseded in the mean time, as the Court cannot grant a petition, even when unopposed, if it be incompetent. Nicolson v. Scott.

LORD GILLIES.—I do not see how this petition can be granted without affording full time to the creditors to come forward. It is only to be granted on “sufficient caution” being found to attend all diets of Court. But how is it possible to determine what is sufficient caution unless an opportunity be afforded to hear both sides.

Wilson, for Petitioner.—It has been understood to be the opinion of the Lords Ordinary who had to consider similar applications in vacation, and also of the clerks who attend to the subject of caution in the Bill-Chamber, that caution to the amount of 10 per cent on the whole debts would be a safe general rule to adopt, wherever there were no special circumstances stated to alter this proportion.

LORD MACKENZIE.—I can only say, that, in so far as I had occasion to consider this subject in vacation, I was of a totally different opinion. I did not think myself warranted to take the strong step of granting a protection against all diligence, unless security was found to the amount of the whole debts, that the debtor should attend all diets of Court when required.

Wilson.—The debts of the petitioner are about £500, and he is ready to find security to the amount of the whole, if necessary.

LORD MACKENZIE.—But there is a doubt as to our jurisdiction to entertain a petition like this, at this stage, upon any caution. That is a question which is now pending in the case of Kippen, and I apprehend that this petition must in the mean time be superseded. And I am afraid that 60 days may have to run in this case, as there are creditors resident in England.

LORDS BALGRAY and GILLIES concurred in the propriety of superseding the petition in the mean time ; and

It was accordingly superseded till the third sederunt day in January.

Nicolson v.
sett.

THE estates of Malcolm Nicolson, cattle-dealer in Skye, were sequestrated, and Martin Martin was appointed trustee. After the usual procedure, a composition of 5s. per pound was offered, and unanimously agreed to by the creditors present at the meeting for deciding on. Nicolson then presented a petition to the Court, with concurrence of the trustee, for approval of the composition and discharge. The trustee's report bore that he possessed the requisite concurrence, in number and value of the whole creditors ranked on the estate. After the petition was ordered to be intimated, Ralph Erskine Scott, accountant in Edinburgh, judicial factor on the sequestrated estate of Alexander Macdonald of Valay, was ranked on Nicolson's estate as a creditor for £281, 1s. 8d., and he opposed the petition, stating various grounds of objection, but contending that, as there was no longer the requisite concurrence in number and value, even assuming the accuracy of the trustee's report, as at the date when it was framed, the petition must be refused. The alleged deficiency in number was  $\frac{1}{10}$  of one creditor. The alleged deficiency in value was about £100.

The application was remitted to the Lord Ordinary on the bills, who pronounced a judgment, refusing the petition. This was done during the time of session, but the ordinary reclaiming days ran to the first box-day. Subsequently to this, other creditors came forward and were ranked on the estate, who gave their concurrence to the petition, and whose votes if computed, restored the requisite statutory proportion of concurrence. A supplementary report to that effect was made by the trustee.

Nicolson then reclaimed against the Lord Ordinary's judgment before the lapse of the reclaiming days. When his note came to be advised, he pleaded—

1st, That if Scott was entitled to come forward, for the first time, after the petition was in Court, and to insist on his vote being counted so as to affect the statutory proportion of concurring creditors, the petitioner was equally entitled to have the votes computed of those creditors who came forward after the judgment of the Lord Ordinary.

2d, That the judgment of the Lord Ordinary was incompetently pronounced, as he ought to have merely reported the cause; but, if competent, it was not of a more final nature than any other judgment by a Lord Ordinary, and was equally liable to be reclaimed against; and,

3d, That no new petition was necessary on his part, as the original petition was duly warranted by the state of the concurrence, when presented, and nothing more than a supplementary report by the trustee was requisite, to entitle the Court to grant the prayer of that petition.

Relief—Cautioner—Messenger.—A party caused a summons to be executed, inhibition to be used on the dependence; a preliminary defence was stated the execution of the summons was irregular, and, after considerable discussion, that defence was sustained, and the party was subjected in expenses; the party had intimated by letter to the messenger as soon as the objection was taken to execution, and the messenger had answered, maintaining his execution to be objectionable; the party had also, in the middle of the discussion, intimated to the cautioners of the messenger, who took no notice of it:—Held both the messenger and his cautioners were liable to relieve the party of expenses of the discussion, and of the expense of the inhibition on the dependence.

MRS COLLIER and husband raised a summons against one Paterson, Dec. 6, 1836, which they employed George Coll, messenger at Falkland, to execute. Coll returned an execution which did not design the parties, and was wholly written upon a sheet of paper at the end of the summons, which contained no portion of the summons engrossed on it. Paterson pleaded a preliminary defence that there was no process, in respect of the irregularity of the execution of citation. In the mean time, the pursuers used inhibition on the dependence. Minutes of debate were ordered on this defence, and the Court (First Division), after advising with Judges of the Second Division, sustained the preliminary defence, and assoilzied with expenses.<sup>1</sup>

During these proceedings, Coll had received intimation by letter from pursuers' agent, as soon as the preliminary defence was stated by Paterson; and he was regularly certiorated by that agent of the steps of procedure, and made aware that he and his cautioners would be looked to for relief. Coll repeatedly wrote in answer, maintaining that the objection to his execution was unfounded, and advising how it might best be overcome, in the discussions before the Court. Intimation was also sent to the agent of Mrs Collier to the cautioners of Coll, in June, 1833, and they took no notice of it.

Mrs Collier and husband, having paid the expenses of Paterson, raised an action against Coll and his cautioners to recover payment of their amount, and also of the expenses of inhibition, and of their own expenses incurred in the question with Paterson.

Coll lodged no defences; but the cautioners denied that intimation had been duly made to them,* and pleaded, that Mrs Collier was bound to have given notice to them, as well as to Coll, as soon as the objection to the citation was stated; that they could then have come forward and taken on themselves, at very little loss, any expense incurred up to that date, and would have done so, as the inhibition in reality had secured nothing even if unchallengeable; and that, at least, they should have been afforded the earliest notice, so that they might judge for themselves whether they would take such a step, or run the risk of litigating the question with Paterson.<sup>1</sup>

Mrs Collier answered, that, by giving timeful notice to Coll, the messenger, she had done all that was incumbent on her. It was his business to give notice to his cautioners, and if he neglected this, they, and not any third party, must suffer for his omission. But, separately, as the cautioners had received intimation in June, 1833, and had not notified any disapproval of the litigation so far as it had then gone, nor intimated a desire that it should be discontinued, and that they would undertake whatever consequences might legally attach to them, on account of the blundered execution, they could not now be permitted to object to the want of earlier intimation. They had waited to take the full benefit of the litigation if it proved successful, and they must take the consequences, after it had proved the reverse, just as if they had adopted it from the first.

The Lord Ordinary "repelled the defences, and found the defenders liable in expenses." His Lordship also found that the liability, for the account incurred by Mrs Collier to her own agent, in the question with Paterson, was for that account as it should be taxed, as between agent and client.

The defenders reclaimed.

LORD BALGRAY.—I think the interlocutor quite right. Had the defenders immediately on receiving intimation as to the litigation, come forward and acknowledged that the execution was wrong and could not be successfully defended, their plea as to the expenses of that discussion would have been in a very different position. But they did nothing of this sort. They allowed the litigation to go on without objection, and would have taken the full benefit of it all, had it proved successful. I see no ground, in these circumstances, for limiting their liability to that portion of the expenses which was incurred subsequently to June, 1833; even supposing that the other ground of due notification having been given to the messenger, was insufficient, as to which it is not necessary now to decide.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I am of the same opinion; and I rather incline to think that due notice to the messenger was all that was required. But it is unnecessary to go into that.

plainly a cautionary obligation, that the lady shall deliver in good condition the furniture hired to her, at the term of Whitsunday 1835. No one can doubt that this, as an obligation ad factum præstandum, is indivisible, which, if it stood without qualification, could never be satisfied by either of the obligants, without delivery of the ipsa corpora of the subjects, or otherwise by payment of the full value of them. The right of the party is, to demand delivery of the goods; and as he has this right against each of the obligants without any division, according to the express terms of the contract, and the admitted rule of law generally, it is a very hard proposition to the common sense of mankind, as well as to the ear of every lawyer who thinks that law is based on plain justice and common sense, to say that, in the very case, and the only case, in which it becomes necessary to consider the surety's obligation, viz. that of the principal failing, and rendering it impossible to fulfil the obligation in specie, by redelivery of the articles, the engagement shall be changed by that fact into something different from what it was at first, and be resolved into precisely one half of its proper amount. There are certainly some words in the passage quoted from Erskine—3. 3. 74.—which apparently give some encouragement to the idea. But they do not reach this case. Whatever might be the sort of cases contemplated, such as that of Dennistoun referred to, it never could be intended to be said by so very accurate a lawyer, that the obligation would change its nature and value by the failure to give specific implement of it. Yet this is what the defender must draw out of it.

“The obligation in the present case is a specific guarantee that the furniture hired shall be restored at a fixed date. That is not altered by the arrival of the term. It is not an optional or alternative engagement to restore the furniture or pay £60. The pursuer had an absolute right to restoration of his furniture, if it were extant. The only limitation is, that the defender and Mr Hamilton should not be liable for furniture beyond the value of £60. Still their obligation was to deliver it; and they would have had no right to keep it, or any part of it, on offering payment of £60. Their privilege of limitation in the value comes into force by the inability to deliver without their own fault. But is the nature of their guarantee changed by this? The Lord Ordinary cannot think it, and is fully convinced that it never entered into the mind of either, when he gave the obligation, that he was not fully bound to make good to the pursuer the redelivery or replacement of furniture to the full value of £60.

“This matter may be made to assume an appearance of subtlety and niceness on the refinements of the Roman Law, and some of the difficulties raised in what were really nice cases in our own law; but on the plain meaning of the obligation now before the Lord Ordinary, he really thinks there can be no reasonable doubt.”

The Lord Ordinary having "repelled the objection insisted in by the defender, as to the incompetency of the award of expenses by the arbiter," Brown reclaimed.

The Court ordered minutes of debate on the general question of the power of arbiters to award expenses, where no such power is specially conferred by the deed of submission.

Decided for Robertson.—

According to the law of Scotland, as founded on the Roman law, an arbiter holds the character of a private judge, selected by the parties litigant, and, in regard to the matters referred, has the same powers of jurisdiction as any ordinary judge before whom the same matters might competently have been brought for decision;<sup>1</sup> but a judge has the power of finding expenses due in an ordinary action, although not expressly demanded or concluded for;<sup>2</sup> and, by parity of reason, an arbiter must be understood to have the power in question of awarding expenses, the point having been moreover already ruled by the Court.<sup>3</sup>

Answered for Brown.—

Arbitration is a process, in which the powers of the arbiters result solely from convention, their measure being the contract of reference; to justify an award of expenses, therefore, it ought to appear, ex facie of the submission, that a power over the costs was conferred on the arbiter;

No. 53. besides, submission is in its nature, a friendly process, resorted to for the very purpose of escaping the charges of judicial proceedings, and the presumption is, that the parties themselves appear and contribute their trouble and attention to the extrication of their own disputes; the circumstance of special clauses on the subject of expenses being generally inserted in deeds of submission is evidence that, without such clauses, the award of costs would be incompetent; and the question is settled in England in favour of this view.

The members of this society were by the charter taken bound to make certain quarterly payments "for the common use and relief of the poor of the said trade, and other necessary uses thereto belonging;" and certain entry-moneys and fines were also authorized, which were likewise appropriated to "the uses foresaid."

In 1808, the society resolved to build a mill for grinding flour, and with this view (as narrated in regulations afterwards adopted) "a large majority of the members, by a minute dated the 8th day of January in that year, bound themselves to grind at the proposed mill the whole of the wheat they had to grind, as soon as the mill should be erected, and to pay a rate per boll for manufacturing the same into flour; such rate being to cover the expense of upholding the mill, and all charges thereon, and also the interest of money advanced to the society, and of any debt that might be contracted in the Society's name; and whatever profit might appear at the yearly balance, after supporting the poor members, were, by the said minute, appointed to be applied to the use of the society."

Accordingly ground was purchased within the bounds of the burgh of Paisley, and a mill erected, for which purpose, in addition to the funds then belonging to the society, a considerable sum of money was required to be borrowed. For some years subsequent to this it continued optional on intrants whether to come under the obligation to grind at the society's mill or not; but, in 1825, a new set of regulations was agreed to, which narrated in the preamble, "that the Bakers' Society of Paisley was formed in the year 1777, by a number of bakers then carrying on said trade in the place, the design of which was to assist such of their decayed brethren, and their widows, and children, as might be reduced to poverty and distress through various causes incident to human life." By these regulations, it was provided that each intrant, before payment of the prescribed entry-money, should "sign an obligation to grind all his wheat at the society's mill," and that "any member contravening the above regulation, shall be obliged to pay to the funds of the society the same rate for whatever number of bolls he may send past the society's mill as if it had been manufactured thereat." These regulations further prescribed certain specific rates of allowance to poor members who were in distress or unable to work, and to the widows and children

No. 54. of members deceased, a lower rate being provided to the previously entered members who should refuse to come under the obligation to grind at the society's mill, than to those who were subject to that regulation. The regulations were confirmed by the Justices of Peace of the county of Renfrew, but without setting forth that they were proceeding under the Friendly Society Acts, or describing the association as a friendly society. The mills were managed by a committee of the society, who employed a considerable number of servants and workpeople, and the business of grinding was carried on extensively both for the members of the society and the public.

Palaley.

From 1810 to 1822, the assessment for the poor (which in Paisley was laid on, in respect of means and substance, according to the rules applicable to royal burghs), was imposed on the Bakers' Society. In 1822 they were relieved, and no assessment was imposed on them till 1831, when a demand was made on them for £6, as the share of the assessment for the year 1831-2, allocated on the society in respect of their trade carried on at the mill. The individual members of the society who resided within the burgh were likewise assessed individually, on their respective means and substance, amongst with the rest of the inhabitants. This demand having been resisted, the collector of the assessment raised an action for payment against the treasurer of the society before the Sheriff's Small Debt Court. The collector having obtained decree from the Sheriff, the assessment was paid, but under protest; and a similar assessment having been demanded for the year 1832-3, the Bakers' Society raised an action in this Court, concluding to have it declared that an assessment could not be imposed on the society as such; and, further, that the society being a friendly society, or at least that the funds being by legal obligation devoted to the support of poor members, their property could not form the subject of assessment, and also concluding on that plea, and on other grounds which it is unnecessary here to mention, to have the assessments and stent-rolls for the years above-mentioned and the Sheriff's decree, reduced and set aside, and for repetition of the amount paid under it.

Parties having differed in their statements of fact as to the extent to which the profits of the mill were appropriated to the support of poor members, &c., the Lord Ordinary remitted to an accountant "to examine the books of the Bakers' Society, and to report the purpose to which the profits realized by the said society are applied, and the annual extent of business carried on by them." A report was accordingly given in by the accountant, from which it appeared that the gross sums paid for grinding averaged about £1000 per annum, but that after paying all expenses and the interest of borrowed money, the clear profits, together with the entrymonies and fines, while they sometimes exceeded the annual amount of allowances (which ran from between £30 to £35), leaving a surplus to be add-to the capital, at other times fell short of it; that from 1824 to 1832 the profits had in all fallen short of the allowances by the sum of £64, which was supplied from the capital stock; but that, on the other hand, from 1809, when the mills were built, to 1824, there appeared, as on the books of the society, making no deduction, however, from the original cost value of the buildings, machinery, &c., an increase of capital stock in all of between £1500 and £1600; and, finally, the accountant reported, that no division of profits or funds among the members had ever taken place other than the distribution of the allowances to poor members, their widows, and children.

On this report being given in, the Lord Ordinary ordered cases to the Court. In these the whole cause was argued, including the special grounds of reduction applicable to the stent-rolls and the Sheriff's decree, but as the Court only decided upon the declaratory conclusions, it is unnecessary to advert to the argument further than as it regarded these.

Pleaded for the Society—

1. The assessment here is imposed according to the rules for Royal burghs, and so there is no rate on heritors as such, as in landward parishes, but simply on inhabitants according to means and substance. In authorizing, however, an assessment on inhabitants, the statutes had regard only to individual persons, who were to be assessed according to their personal wealth, and there are no words sanctioning the imposition of a rate upon societies as distinct from the members. This also is the less admissible, as the individual members being themselves separately assessed, their income, if any, derived from societies of which they are members, must necessarily be taken into view in forming the general estimate of their means and substance on which to assess them. Thus, although it is not unusual for mercantile companies to submit to be assessed as companies, yet the case of Buchanan and Parker<sup>1</sup> shews, that whenever that mode is objected to, it is held that it must be abandoned, because the question so anxiously argued there, as to whether Mr Parker was to be considered an inhabitant of Glasgow, to the effect of being assessed in respect of his share of the profits of the business carried on there by the firm of which he was a partner, could never have been raised had it been deemed competent to assess the company as such.

2. The society here in question is substantially a Friendly Society, or, at all events, it is an association, the whole funds of which are legally appropriated to the support of the poor members, their widows and children. It is not, however, to warrant an assessment in respect of any property, necessary not merely that there should be such property existing, but that it should constitute wealth in the persons of parties liable to be rated.<sup>2</sup>

Poor—Harbour—Feu-Duties.—1. The granters of a public harbour not liable in 'poors' rates on the duties and profits thereof, customary or statutory, in so far as they were applied to the maintaining and improving the harbour. 2. A duty on goods imported for the support of the clergy not subject to assessment. The rents of buildings erected by money borrowed under statutory authority which rents were appropriated by the statute exclusively to the purposes of the harbour, not liable to be rated, but a rate submitted to as on an estimated rent of a solum distinct from the buildings. 4. Feu-duties not a subject of assessment.

THE Magistrates of Edinburgh, in virtue of ancient royal charters, confirmed by Parliament, granting to them the port and harbour of Leith, and of immemorial usage following thereon, are entitled to levy certain dues from all vessels coming into the roadstead or harbour; and by special statute, further duty, called the merk per ton, is leviable for behoof of the ministers of the city. By a series of acts of Parliament, the magistrates were from time to time empowered to borrow money for the improvement of the harbour, in forming piers, docks, &c., they being nominated in the several statutes the trustees for that purpose, and various additional duties were, by the same statutes, imposed on all vessels coming into the harbour. These duties, it was declared, should be appropriated "solely" to the keeping of the docks, &c., in repair, paying the interest and repaying the principal of the money borrowed, and forming a sinking fund for emergencies, and to no other purpose whatsoever; and in general they were to cease and determine on the debt being paid off. The Magistrates were further authorized to acquire property adjacent to the harbour; and it was provided that the rents and feu-duties of such adjacent property so acquired, or previously belonging to the magistrates, should be appropriated to the purposes of the statutes, in the same way and to same objects with the statutory dues. Under authority of these acts of Parliament, the Magistrates at various periods borrowed large sums, amounting in all to £265,000, which they employed in the formation of piers and docks, in acquiring adjacent property and erecting thereon, or on ground previously belonging to them, buildings necessary for the purposes of the harbour. Ultimately the Treasury became the sole creditor on the harbour, obtaining security over the docks &c., and the dues, rents, and profits, which, including the ordinary harbour dues leviable under the charter, were not denied to be entirely appropriated to the purposes of the harbour, leaving no surplus applicable to the common good of the city. The Magistrates had been in use to pay poor's rates in the parish of North Leith, in which the harbour partly lay, in respect of certain property adjacent to the harbour, which they considered themselves to hold, unfettered by the provisions of the harbour statutes; but, in 1828, the heritors and kirk-session imposed on the Magistrates of Edinburgh, as heritors, in respect of the harbour, so far as situated in that parish, a share of the assessment effecting to the whole gross proceeds of the harbour, including (1.) the merk per ton duties, payable to the ministers of Edinburgh; (2.) the ordinary harbour dues, leviable by the magistrates, in virtue of their charters and immemorial usage; (3.) the statutory dues, &c., dues; and (4.) the rents and feu-duties of the adjacent grounds and buildings thereon, whether acquired under the acts, or previously belonging to the magistrates. The magistrates, while they were willing to submit to an assessment in hip at the same time stated his views in the following note.

rd Ordinary does not hold that the corporation of a burgh, holding perty as a mere non-resident heritor, in a parish situated out of the mpted from the payment of poor tax, on account of these subjects, here there is some difficulty; for the corporation of Edinburgh, by ates, have rights, and powers, and duties within the parish of North
 i. e. supposing the port to be partly situated in that parish, and can iewed as a mere non-resident heritor. Nor does the Lord Ordinary of feudal grantee of a port situated in a parish may not be liable to pay that parish, for the free and clear profits which he annually puts into ut for his own personal use. But in so far as he bona fide lays out e these dues or profits to the maintenance and improvement of the rd Ordinary cannot see any ground why they should be taxed for the
 h. It may be, in strict law, such a grantee cannot be compelled to to keep up (though that is a proposition which the Lord Ordinary be maintained, and in its full extent, when the trade increases of the harbour); but, at any rate, the Lord Ordinary thinks is natural justice and propriety, to improve the harbour, so public, as far at least as the harbour-dues will go; and that

3. Even if it should be held that the whole property of the society is not so absolutely devoted to the support of poor members, &c., as not to be to any extent applicable to the benefit of the members themselves, still in point of fact at the present time, and for some years past, the whole profits have been entirely absorbed by the allowances, so that a part has even been appropriated to the liquidation of the debt.

Pleaded for the Stentmasters, &c.

1. There is nothing in the statutes which excludes the imposing of an assessment on societies, as distinct persons, on the means of the society, and although if the members are also inhabitants, they will be assessed individually, yet justice can always be done by allowing a deduction proportionate to their interest in the profits of the society separately assessed. Accordingly, practice has sanctioned this construction of the statute, and it is the universal custom in all the burghs of Scotland

when such grantee does so apply the profits of it bona fide, he ought not to be taxed for these as if they had been appropriated to his private emolument. Now this seems to be what the town of Edinburgh, to the full extent of all the harbour dues and profits, at least for a time of which no termination is in view, and therefore the Lord Ordinary sees no termini habiles for this action, in reference to the dues and profits at present."

Thereafter a state was given in for the magistrates, in terms of the Lord Ordinary's appointment, in which certain premises were admitted to be held in free and ordinary property, while in regard to the yards and dry docks formed, and some buildings erected with the money borrowed under the authority of the statutes, and for the purposes of the harbour, and the rents and profits of which were applicable to the harbour, along with the dock-dues, they contended that they could not be liable till these became part of the free and ordinary property of the city by the harbour debt being paid off, though they agreed, on the principle of the decision in the Leith Fort case, to pay on a certain estimated rent, as in the original solum, with reference to the embankments or buildings formed or erected with the statutory funds. On this the Lord Ordinary pronounced an interlocutor (4th June, 1834), finding certain of the property liable and certain portions of it not liable, and proceeding thus:—"But in respect the defenders appear willing, for peace sake, to consent to pay a certain amount of poors' rate on certain of these subjects, upon the principle of the decision in the case of Leith Fort, allows them to give in a minute, stating for what subjects, and to what amount, they are so willing to pay poors' rate."

In consequence of this recommendation, the magistrates and commissioners agreed to submit to an assessment as on a certain rental, being considerably under what they had been in use to pay before the action was raised, and this being accepted by the parish, the Lord Ordinary's judgment was acquiesced in without the cause being brought before the Inner-House.

4. On the contrary, the minute under which the mill of the soas built expressly stipulates, that whatever profit might appear at ly balance, after supporting the poor members, &c., should be to the "use of the society." Accordingly, since the mill was e capital stock of the society has been greatly increased from the f their business, and if the society were dissolved, it would form a division among the individual members. There is thus no ground allegation that the society's property is legally appropriated to the of the poor, and the circumstance that in point of fact a portion of its are so applied yearly, cannot support the conclusion of exempt can only at most give rise to a plea for modifying the amount of assessment imposed, which is not the question here raised, nor is the a matter with which this Court will interfere without some alle-of corruption in the allocation of the rate. Besides, even if the were applicable to the support of the poor members, that would ite no ground of exemption. All property is liable in poors'-rate, e single exception of property belonging to the King; and even o, may be assessed, if beneficially occupied by a third party. The : cases having been put out for advising, the Court (February 16, delivered the following opinions :—

JUSTICE CLERK.—This is a case rather out of the common line, though points it is not necessary to decide. I don't think the objections founded Small Debt Act of much consequence, and the main question regards the to assessment. After attending to the constitution of the society, I can't be a purely charitable society, or a Friendly Society, in terms of the Parliament. It has other objects in view than the support of poor mem-is for the benefit of themselves and the public, as well as the poor mem-their widows and children. Though care is taken to provide for these the surplus profits are subject to be accumulated and added to the capital stock has accordingly been so accumulated; and if they chose the members involve and draw shares of the stock pro rata. A great deal of the argument, is not applicable. There would no doubt be a great deal in it, and I would have great difficulty in allowing any assessment if it were purely a tax for support of the poor ; but I don't think this society comes under that description. There is, however, another point, whether, under the statute regarding assessments in burghs—for that is the rule here—it is competent to lay an assessment on a society as on individuals. The Act 1579 says the “haill inhabitants,” means individuals, and I think the pursuers completely meet the defenders' argument on the case of Parker, which makes against the defenders, as if it had held competent to assess companies it would have put an end to that case at once. On this point I think we must, before deciding, have more information as to the averred practice, and if the defenders' statement as to the practice be correct the question will still remain if it be sufficient to warrant the deviation from the statute.

and Magistrates

LORD GLENLEE.—It is stated on both sides, that for time immemorial the assessment in Paisley has been the same as in Royal burghs, and it is admitted many societies are assessed without objection, and that the same practice is followed in Royal burghs generally to assess companies as well as individuals, to take care not to lay on a double assessment. Then if the pursuers are wrong on merits, where would be the use of setting aside the Sheriff's decree on object in form ?

LORD MEADOWBANK.—I understood it was the custom of the burgh of Paisley to assess societies ; but I cannot believe that it is the general practice of all burghs. But even if this were made out in Paisley, unless it were the general practice of the country, I would doubt the relevancy of the statement.

LORD MEDWYN.—I differ on the general point. I do not hold this a friendly society, nor do I think that of any consequence ; but I look to the object of the society. Now this is nothing but a charitable society. The origin of the fund, whether from termly contributions or the profits of a mill, can make no difference. If the society had remained on the footing on which it stood from 1701 to 1808, it would have been impossible to hold it other than a mere charitable society, and it could not have been assessed. In 1808, the parties thought it a better way to raise the sum required by the erection of a mill, at which they came bound to grind their grain ; but the revenue of the society was still always to be applied to the same object of relief of poor members, and while so applied do not think it assessable. Now it is clear that since 1824, not one sixpence has been applied to any object but the support of the poor ; and so far from augmenting the capital, £64 has since then been taken from the stock. It is, therefore, purely charitable society, raising funds perhaps in the most equal way, though the mode of raising them makes no difference on the question. If ever the business came to yield more, so as to make profit to themselves, then each individual would be obliged to add that to his means and substance, and would become assessable to a proportionately larger extent as an individual ; but in the meantime at least no part of profits are received by the ordinary members. Then it is admitted by the defenders that this is the only instance of a charitable society in Paisley being assessed, and the ground alleged for doing so is, that money is raised by grinding &c. I cannot see how that makes any difference, it being clear that no profit made to individuals so as to warrant its being an exception. On the other ground, if the town of Paisley have adopted the rule of royal burghs in other matters than this, as in sasines, there would come the other question, whether, under the panies can be assessed as such at all; but on the first point I think it most unreasonable to alter the practice of the burgh as to charitable

No. 54.

Bakers' Society of Paisley v.
Stentmasters
and Magistrates
of Paisley.

GLENLEE.—What Lord Medwyn has stated might be of consequence to view in inquiring into the practice. I do not think that by the constitution of the society the profits are entirely set apart for the poor. After supporting them, they are to be set apart for the use of the society; and in point of fact, the amount paid to the poor is taken out of the whole revenue, and any surplus is added to the stock account, and the consequence is that this society now have considerable property, and have paid off debt.

MEDWYN.—I did not mean to say they might not some time be assessed, at present.

Court accordingly appointed the parties "to state in minutes their views as to the practice within burgh of assessing mercantile companies, as also societies of the kind here in question, for the support of the poor." Minutes were thereafter lodged, in which the statements of the parties agreed as to the practice being general in burghs, of assessing mercantile companies. As to associations like that here in question, the Bakers' Society stated that there were no instances of their being assessed, at least in Paisley in particular, although there were a variety of societies for similar objects, possessed some of them of very extensive property in heritable subjects, as well as money, no rate was laid on any of them. On the other hand, the Stentmasters, while they admitted that a rate was laid on various societies possessed of property, whose funds were appropriated to the support of their poor members, contended that there was a material distinction between these and the Bakers' Society, inasmuch as they did not carry on any trade or business, such as was done on by that society.

The cause being again put out for advising, December 6th,—

MR JUSTICE-CLERK.—We have not got much light from the minutes, and the question comes back upon us—Is this a purely charitable society? I cannot say it is a purely charitable society, and it is not a Friendly society under the Act. We see them laying out funds—purchasing a mill and manufacturing—making profits so as to discharge debts, and they might divide the funds among the members; and I cannot affirm that it is a purely charitable society within the statute. Then how is the question to be dealt with. It is said the law is in favour of assessing societies. I would have much difficulty notwithstanding the practice, in determining that these are to be assessed as individuals. The case of Parker would not have been raised, if the principle had been to lay a rate on societies as individuals, and I am not prepared to go that length.

GLENLEE.—In the very articles of the society it is said, that any surplus supporting the poor is to go to "the use of the society." Is not that a plain intimation that they looked to the probability of there being a profit, and that after paying for the poor, it was to be applied for the use of the society? All in all, they have made a profit, and have applied it to extinguish the debt contracted in building, and I think the society assessable. As to the rate, that is not properly before us. The only question is, whether they are liable to be assessed at all. It may be that, if the funds are exhausted for a particular year, they should not be assessed for that year, but in the ordinary case there is no ground to hold that they are taxed beyond a reasonable rate.

LORD MCDWYN.—If this were originally a mercantile establishment for making profit, and a charity engrafted on it, I could concur with these observations. But looking to the origin and nature of the society, I take a different view. It was instituted in 1777, and it is not alleged to be different from the Weavers' and other societies that are not assessed. Whether it be a Friendly society or not, it is a charitable one, and there are at present no divisible funds after devoting to charities. Before the mill was erected, it is clear that the society could not have been assessed. But if they substitute custom for contributions, does that alter the true nature of the society, and make it a trading company for gain? Paisley partakes of the character of a royal burgh, and the assessment is on the hable inhabitants according to their means and substance. The whole members are assessed, and if they derived any benefit from the society, it would be taken into view in assessing them individually; and I see no reason for assessing the corporation, because the members contribute by custom instead of annual sums. But besides, it cannot be called a profit where they have been paying off debt only. I cannot view it as an ordinary mercantile company. In Parker's case, the partner lived in the Barony parish, but the company was in Glasgow; and the question could not have been raised, if the principle had been to assess companies. Considering that Friendly societies and other corporations are not taxed, and the reasonableness of the thing, when all the profits go to support their own poor, I think that they should be exempted.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The individuals are liable for any profit they may make; but I am not prepared to assess the society.

LORD MEADOWBANK.—I think the society should not be assessed, except on any surplus after supporting the poor; but the question, whether the rate on the surplus is to be imposed on the individual members is not properly before us.

The cause having stood over that an interlocutor might be framed, the Court found that they could not agree as to the question of the competency of imposing an assessment on a society at all, being equally divided on that point. On this, the Society agreed to waive a decision regarding it, and the following interlocutor was accordingly pronounced.

“THE LORDS having considered the revised cases for the parties as taken to report by the Lord Ordinary, with the minutes signed and ordered, Find that it has not been sufficiently established, that the Bakers' Society of Paisley can be viewed either as a regular friendly society or a purely charitable institution, the funds of which are in no respect liable to contribution for the maintenance of the poor; Find that in so far as there are rents or profits accruing from the mill or other property or trade belonging to the society society over and above the usual allowances granted to poor and aged members, and divisible among the members or applicable to the purposes of the society generally, such rents and profits are liable to be taken into computation and assessed for the maintenance of the poor of Paisley, in terms of law: Find no expenses due; and with these findings remit to the Lord Ordinary to proceed accordingly.”

Teinds—Valuation.—Circumstances in which the Court pronounced a judgment, finding that a certain document, if not affected by a plea of dereliction, might be proved of as a valuation of the teinds, led before the sub-commissioners in the shire of Forfar, of as early a date as 4th and 12th June 1627.

At the earlier period of the reign of Charles I. his Majesty executed a general revocation of grants by his predecessors to the prejudice of the Crown; and in August 1626, a summons of reduction was raised in his Majesty's name, setting forth his “good and undoubted right to all kirks within this kingdom, by act of annexation, as being universal patron of all abbacies, priories, and all other ecclesiastical benefices, by the right of the Crown;” that his majesty was under an obligation, enforced by statute, and by the sanction of the oath to be taken at the coronation, to maintain the bail lands and rents pertaining to the Crown and Kirk in the said kingdom;” and accordingly was entitled to pursue this action “to the effect the patrimony of the Crown may be restored, the lands sufficiently planted, colleges, schools, and hospitals sufficiently maintained, and the gentry of our kingdom relieved of the heavy burdens laid against them in leading of their teinds, which are the uses contained in our late revocation, declaration, and proclamations made thereanent; also, by our said revocation, having good right to annul and reduce heritable offices and regalities granted in prejudice of our Crown and royal prerogative.” The defenders were required to bring with them charters, &c. “of all and sundry lands and baronies, kirks, teinds, patronages, pertaining to whatsoever abbacy, priory, or other benefice whatsoever;” “together with all infeftments of heritable offices or lands,” and to see the same reduced, &c. It was stated among the grounds of reduction, that “the said lands, kirks, teinds, and patronages were unlawfully taken from the Kirk” in a wrongful manner, and that the Kirk had been enormously hurt by the erections which had been made

No. 55.
 Dec. 7, 1836.
 Earl of Airlie
 v. Ogilvie.

In January 1627, the King appointed the Primate, Chancellor, and Treasurer, and a number of peers, prelates, freeholders, and burgesse his commissioners, “to deal, treat, compone, transact, and agree wi such persons as shall, at any time hereafter, before the expiry of th commission, be content to treat, agree, and modify such reasonable sati faction for the said erections, and temporalities, and benefices, feu-dutie and other certain rents of silver or victual of the said temporalities, teind and patronages of the said benefices, mortified lands and rents, heritabl offices and regalities, changed tenures or holdings, and taxed wards, pr properties, or casualties of the crown or principality, unlawfully acquired ( possessed by any of them, and yet fitting to be secured to the person unto the present possessors of the said property, upon reasonable cond tions.”

The Commission was to begin to sit on March 1st, and to continue till August 1st, and thereafter during the King’s pleasure. Power wa given to the Commissioners, or any twelve of them, to appoint meeting &c.; and “by commissions, or any lawful ways or means, to require th just rentals and valuations of the premises, &c.,” and to treat and agr what should be given to the parties for their pretended rights “to an parts or pertinents of the particulars above written;” “and how lawfi dispositions may be made thereof to others, who are willing to buy the tythes or premises; and how the superiorities, and feu-duties, and her table offices may be resigned unto his Majesty, and restored to the Crow again, therewith to remain for ever.” Power was given to disjoin unite parishes, or divide such extensive parishes as required division; “and t provide for sufficient building and repairing of churches thereof, the teind shall be reserved and dispoed as aforesaid, if the said churches be n already sufficiently provided, and for providing their ministers with suff cient lawful stipends;” also to make agreements as to other pious use and establishing schools in remote parts of the kingdom; and also wit power to them to call and convene before them the immediate heriton tacksmen, and possessors of all such lands, out of which the teinds be r ceived by the parties, or led, or otherwise paid, and to advise for the such other lawful rights and sentences for the said teinds as they sha think fit; and for such compositions and yearly duties to be reserved t his Majesty, as the said Commissioners and the parties shall agree upon.

In the commission the King promised “in verbo principis, to ratifi and approve such rights of the teinds, lands, or premises as shall be mad or advised by the saids Commissioners, &c.” Publication of the com mission was ordered to be made, “that the parties interested may hav due warning to provide themselves for the better buying of their ow teinds, and selling the securities of their lands, &c,” with certification, “proprietors or tacksmen and rentallers of land did not come in ar agree with the saids commissioners before the expiry of this commissio for all their teinds to be secured to them, that then his Majesty sha farther secure the same unto the parties having no title thereto, for such a reasonable yearly rent as the commissioners shall appoint and think expedient according to the nature of their saids pretended rights, excepting always the teind of his Majesty's property and principality, &c." No. 55.

Dec. 7, 1836.
Earl of Airlie
v. Ogilvie.

The Commission also declared the King's pleasure to be, that the changed tenures and holdings should be restored to their ancient state, unless "a reasonable increase of yearly rent to the Crown" was paid. The royal pleasure was farther declared to be, that the commissioners should agree "upon the establishing a certain patrimony to the Crown, therewith to remain in all time coming." The Commissioners were empowered to act in furtherance of the objects intended by the Commission, even though not expressly mentioned in it; and, in cases of doubt, to consult the King, whose answer should be as valid as if it formed part of the commission itself. In the event of an agreement being effected "as to the haill premises," the action of reduction, and all legal procedure on the revocation was to be given up. The commissioners were directed, however, to conclude nothing finally until the King should approve; especially as none of the lieges were bound to treat and agree with the commissioners "farther than upon their own voluntary agreement or approbation."

One of the earliest minutes of the Lords Commissioners had special reference to the extent of their powers in regard to teinds. It was in these terms :—

"Anent what teinds falleth under the Commission.

"4th April, 1627. The Lords of Commission have full power of his Majesty to treat of the haill teinds within the kingdom of Scotland."

Another minute, on 6th April, 1627, was in these words :—

"Anent discussion of valuation and plantation of churches.

"The King's Majesty grants warrant to the said Lords for discussing all valuations within the kingdom, and to plant the haill churches to be provided with victual and money."

Another minute, of the same date, bears, that the Marquis of Hamilton submitted his teinds and feu-maills to the saidis Lordis." On 29th May 1627, a minute was made, declaring what proportion "forth of the teinds" should belong to his Majesty, in name of annuity. On 13th June, the following minute was made :—

"Anent what payment of free-rent should be teind, the Lords finds the fourth part of the free-rent to be teind."

In February 1628, there is a minute extant, that "old rentals should be put for valuation, if the parties made no opposition." And in November following, "The Lords found that appellations from sub-commissioners should be before themselves."

Some of the submissions (all of which were made in 1628), by the Lords of Erection as to their superiorities, and by the bishops, burghs, and barons as to their teinds, it was specially narrated, that between

There are many valuations extant, which were made in 1629, and several in 1628, but none appear to have been discovered so early as 1627 before the date when the Earl of Airlie, patron of the united parishes of Cortachy and Clova, in Forfarshire, and the Hon. Donald Ogilvy of Clova, heritable proprietor of the barony of Cortachy, raised an action against the Rev. William Ogilvy, minister of the united parish, to have an alleged report of valuation of stock and teind by the sub-commissioners in the Presbytery of Forfar, dated 4th and 12th June, 1627, ratified and approved. The document was said to have fallen aside for a period of about two centuries, and to have been accidentally discovered among the family papers of Lord Airlie. It was in these terms :

"Jaj vi th 27 zeires.

"At Rottnall the 4 and 12 June resp. conveyed Allexr. Ogilvy of Clonkala, Andrew Ogilvy of Colloe, John Ogilvy of Gala, John Lindsay at ye Miln of Clovay, elected and chosen be ye Moderator and Pbie of Forfar, and sworn according to ye comission directed to yam, convened with ye minister of ye parochie of Cortaquhie and Clovay, and after due tryall and examination for satisfaction and answering to ye particulars committed to them, Be the Lords of his Maies commission, sett down the rentall of ye said paroches and particulars, as follows :—

"Callimce, &c."

After enumerating various lands, there was a distinct title, "Clovay," prefixed to another enumeration of lands, at the close of which, various statements were given, respecting the causes of uniting the parishes; the troublesome duties of the cure; the number of communicants in each parish; the want of an additional church; and the want of a parish school and also of a "hospitall," &c. It also stated, "At ye union is ordaine be ye platt foresaid, In stipend for Cortag. fyve hundred markes to be payed for parsonage and vicarage, Be tham who are Taxm., who is now my lord Ogilvey of ye whole Rooms except of ye lands of Colloe, quyre ye laird of Clovay remains taxman, and pays for the same proportionally

v. Ogilvie.

In regard to the parish of Clovay, "distinct from Cortachy," it was stated, "Thair is ordaned now, be ye platt foresaid, a hundred markes to be payed out of ye teind scheaves by my Lord Marquis of Hamilton, and payed by ye laird of Clovay, as taxman for him; and the whol vicarage of ye paroch of Clovay whilk was and is now sett to ye laird of Clovay for fourtie lib. It is a kirk of ye abbacie of Aberbk., and comptat a paroch of Glamiss."

The document was indorsed on the back in these terms:—"The valuation of ye lands of ye paroch of Cortochy, be ye minister and elders, writers, be ordinance off ye grytt Comissione at Edr. Being choysin also by ordinance of ye Moderator of ye Presbetrie of Forfar."

Parties were at issue whether or not Cortachy was a parsonage: The pursuer averred it to be so, and the defender disputed this on the record.

The defender alleged that the above document was not a valuation by any sub-commissioners duly authorized, 1st, Because the Royal Commission of 1627 did not contain authority to value teinds, and no such authority existed prior to the surrenders of teinds under the submissions in 1628; and accordingly no valuation had yet been produced of earlier date than 1628,<sup>1</sup> and very few anterior to 1629. 2d, It was not a proper report of a subvaluation of teinds, but embraced a variety of heterogeneous statistics; and in particular, it could not be intended as such valuation, because it only gave the cumulo rental of stock and teind together, and there was no law at that time enacted fixing any definite proportions for ascertaining the amount of teinds upon a given amount of rental; and even, if the teinds could have been valued, there was then no law to compel the heritor to accept that value as a surrogatum for the drawn teind. 3d, Assuming Cortachy to have been a parsonage, it would follow that the teinds, being possessed by a beneficed clergyman, were exempted from the submission by the clergy,<sup>2</sup> which provided, "that we, and every one of us, enjoy the fruit and rent of our several benefices as they are possessed by us at the present time, and that the same be not hurt nor diminished neither in quantity nor quality, whether the same be paid to us in rental bolls or by gathering of the teind sheaves." The decree of the Court, in 1629, made a corresponding exemption. And 4th, That there was no sufficient evidence that the parties who professed to make the valuation, held any legitimate authority to act as sub-commissioners, especially as there was no recorded notice of any sub-commissioners earlier than November 1628; or that they acted under the Commission 1627, in place of acting under one of the commissioners of 1617 or 1621, having some analogous objects, but possessing no power to value teinds. Neither did it appear that all parties were duly before them.

The pursuers answered, 1st, Power to lead a valuation of teinds was undoubtedly possessed by the commissioners appointed in 1627. The terms of the Commission, and the minutes of the commissioners, proved this; and it was so stated by both Erskine<sup>1</sup> and Connell<sup>2</sup> on tithes. The power to value, extended, before the submissions of 1628, to all who chose voluntarily to appear before the Commission.<sup>3</sup> And the Court had recently approved the report of a subvaluation * made under authority of that Commission, though dated as late as 1635. 2d. Teinds—Valuation—Process.—Circumstances in which the Court approved a valuation of teinds led before the sub-commissioners in the Presbytery of Perth, who were appointed under the High Commission of 1627;—Holding (1.) that, though dated as late as 1635, the report was not objectionable either on account of the certification in the proclamation by the High Commission, dated March 15, 1633, or the issuing of the new Commission of 1633, but might competently there-after be signed and approved of; (2.) that there was reasonable evidence of the valuation having been actually led prior to August 1631, though the report was not signed till 1635; and (3.) that the failure to cite the minister was no irregularity in respect that he was merely stipendiary, and the titular was duly cited.

Feb. 5, 1833.
 Teind Court.
 L. Moncreiff.

THE report of a valuation by the sub-commissioners of the Presbytery of Perth, bore to be signed on 25th August 1635, and that the sub-commission had been expedite on February 2, 1629. It appeared from the report, that there had been various diets of probation, before the report was signed, but the precise dates of these were not given. In the parish of Tippermuir, the minister of which was stipendiary, a part of the lands, valued, was described as belonging to “Mungo, Master of Stormont,” who became Viscount Stormont<sup>1</sup> on 27th August, 1631. The miln-lands of Pitcairn were among the lands of the Master of Stormont so valued. These lands are now and have long been part of the parish of Redgorton. The report bore, that the Bishop of Dunkeld was titular of the teinds of the parish of Tippermuir. It stated that the sub-commissioners had appointed a Procurator-Fiscal, and other requisite officers, and that they had duly cited all persons having interest, and “the said haill persounes, heritors, and titulars particularly above-named, within the foresaid haill parochines within the Presbytery of Perth;” and that “the said persons, heritors, and titulars,” had appeared and led a proof before them.

On March 15, 1633, the High Commission issued a proclamation, directing sub-commissioners to lodge their reports by the first day of June 1633, with certification “to them that sall neglect,” that the sub-commissioners should be fined, and “the heritors and titulars sall be debarred fra all valuation and benefit of probation before the sub-commissioners, and sall be conveyened at the instance of his Majes-lvocate, before the Lords and others of the Great Commission, at Halyrud there to hear and see their valuations and probation thereof led, &c." On th, 1633, in respect of the reports not returned, the Lord-Advocate, in the of High Commission, " protested that the certification (contained in the ation) might pass against the sub-commissioners, titulars and heritors." By

c. 19, a new Commission was appointed " for the finishing and full perfec-the glorious worke anent the teinds, maintenance of ministers, and others l." The commissioners were directed to " prosecute and follow forth the an of whatsoever teinds, parsonage or vicarage, within the kingdom, which yet unvalued : And also to receive the reports from the sub-commissioners ted within ilke presbyterie, of the valuation of whatsoever teinds led and d before them, according to the tenor of the sub-commissioners direct to fect." They were also empowered " to appoint committees or sub-com-of their own number, to receive the reports of the said valuations made or nade ;" and likewise to appoint " sub-commissioners, not being of their own r, within any parochine or presbyterie of the countrie, for leading and deduthe said valuations, and to receive the reports thereof, &c."

ert Smythe of Methven, proprietor of the miln-lands of Pitcairn, in the pa-Redgorton, raised a process of approbation of the report of sub-valuation mentioned, to which the minister of Redgorton gave in defences, embracing f a special nature as to an alleged res judicata and dereliction, and also as to t whether the lands of Pitcairn formed part of the parish of Tippermuir at e of the valuation. Besides these, he separately pleaded, that as the report ated as late as 1635, and proceeded from commissioners named under the ission 1627, which wholly fell by the issuing of the new Commission in it was made without authority by parties who were functi. And in addition , the protestation of the Lord Advocate, on 5th June 1633, and the relative ation of the previous proclamation of the high commission struck at all valua-by sub-commissioners, acting under that commission, and not previously
ed. This report, therefore, could not have been approved by the commission 3, even if presented to them as soon as it was signed, and it could not be ed by the teind court now. Separately, there was not sufficient evidence l parties had been cited, especially the minister ; and if the lands were not part of the parish of Tippermuir, that alone was sufficient to set aside the lure in a question with the defender. The pursuer in answer, pleaded, that the report was signed as late as August 1635, there had evidently been various of probation, all of which were of an earlier date ; that in particular the lands airn, along with others, were described when valued, as belonging to " Mungo, r of Stormont," which must have been anterior to August 1631, when he e Viscount Stormont ; and that, if the sub-valuation of these lands was led and ed before the protestation in 1633, and the new commission of that year, it ompetent to make a report of such subvaluation at any after period, as it was f the objects of the new commission to receive reports of such valuations and re them, if regular. The pursuer pleaded, separately, that this same report was repeatedly approved,<sup>1</sup> as to other lands, by judgments of this Court ; and any subvaluations under the commission 1627, though not dated till after had been approved by the teind court, and it was now too late to object to otherwise regular. In regard to the citation of parties, this was stated ex the report and must be presumed post tantum temporis ; and it was not to cite the minister at all, as he was merely stipendiary, and the titular was duly cited.<sup>1</sup> It was unnecessary to enquire into the effect of the lands having belonged, at the date of the valuation, to any other parish than Tippermuir, as evidence was adduced sufficient to establish this.

The Lord Ordinary ordered cases and reported them to the Court of Teinds. His Lordship issued this note of his opinion. "The Lord Ordinary is clearly of opinion that the plea of the defender, founded on the circumstance of the subvaluation not having been reported till 1635, is altogether untenable. The evidence derived from the fact that the Master of Stormont, in whose name the valuation was made, had ceased to bear that designation on 27th August 1631, appears to be as satisfactory as can reasonably be expected, post tantum temporis, that the valuation had been made before that date. And without going into the particular points of the argument, the Lord Ordinary thinks that it is a great deal too late to maintain now, that no subvaluation by the commissioners, under the commission 1633, can be approved of unless it was reported in conformity to the order of the commissioners on the 15th March 1633, or before the statute 1633. Many subvaluations so situated have been approved of. This very report has been approved of in various cases; and very lately in the case of Mr M'Donald of St Martin's. The Court cannot give one law to one heritor, and another to another, on the same deed. But the pursuer's argument is also quite satisfactory to the Lord Ordinary on the principle of the question."

His Lordship then considered the question of evidence, whether the defender had shown that the lands were no part of the parish of Tippermuir at the date of the valuation, in which his Lordship considered the defender to have failed. His note then proceeded: "If it were to be held that the lands were not part of the parish of Tippermuir at the time of the valuation, the Lord Ordinary would have great doubts as to its legality. The absence of the minister is not a good objection, as he was clearly stipendiary, if the titular was properly called, and the proceedings were regular. But though there is a difference between this case and that of Kilmaly, the principle is not altogether inapplicable; for there might be reason for dealing differently with the valuation, with reference to the lands being in one parish or in the other; and if the titular or his agents, believed these lands to be in Redgorton parish, they might not find occasion to give any attention to the proceedings as to Tippermuir, notwithstanding his general right of titularity. Besides, would it not be such a misdescription, as to annul the valuation in question with the minister, independent of any defect of appearance? Whether it was necessary to call the minister or not, he had a title to appear. The Lord Ordinary must confess, however, that the act or decree of the commissioners, dated 23d March 1631, as given by Sir John Connell (Law of Par. 33), bearing that the teinds of land annexed should still belong to the original parish, if it really did take the force of law at that time, would go a great way at once to obviate the objection and to explain how the lands came to be valued as in Tippermuir, if they had been previously annexed to Redgorton. But he would require more authority for that before he could decide on it. The Lord Ordinary is of opinion that the explanations in the case for the pursuer are sufficient to obviate the pleas of res judicata and dereliction."

On considering the report,

THE COURT "adhered to his Lordship's opinion, as expressed in his note, approved of the report of the sub-commissioners libelled, and decerned the approbation accordingly."

JUSTICE-CLERK.—I think it is attended with some difficulty, to decide rue character and effect of the document founded on by the pursuers; but, oking with some care into the authorities, I have come to be of the opinion s a subvaluation to which the Court must give effect in this process of pro-
 There is some difference between the scope of the royal commission in id the subsequent commission, but I do not at all agree with the defender ing that the former of these commissions was not intended and empowered valuations of stock and teind. On the contrary I am satisfied that the sioners were to lead such valuations, and the authority both of Erskine and l is express in stating that valuations, to a great extent, were led under it.
 re that the subvaluation, now under discussion, appears to be the earliest in f date which has yet been discovered, but there are many extant which were 1628. All these must have been led by the commissioners appointed in and there were no others before whom they could have been led. Upon this concur entirely in the opinion expressed by Lord Moncreiff in the case of ton, decided February 5, 1834, where his Lordship states “it is a great deal to maintain now that no subvaluation of the sub-commissioners, under the

approved of the report of the sub-commissioners, which was of a subvaluation made under the authority of the commission of 1627. The note of the Lord Ordinary in that case is very important, and I hold it to be sound law. In the present case I consider, that effect must be given to the subvaluation. The document produced seems to be not only a careful, but very accurate document, considering the date at which it was framed. And although there is a certain amount of statistical information contained in it, beyond what was necessary for a mere subvaluation of teinds, it must be remembered that the commission of 1627 had various other important objects in view, and the minuteness of the report only shows that the sub-commissioners were the more assiduous in the discharge of their duty. In regard to the plea of dereliction I think the cause should, before answer, be remitted to the Lord Ordinary to be farther prepared.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I concur very much in the opinion which has just been delivered. I am satisfied that this report was not prepared by sub-commissioners appointed either under the commission 1617, or 1621, or any other than the commission 1627. It is true that it is of a rather peculiar tenor, and embraces a variety of particulars which I never saw in any valuation before. But it must be remembered that the commission 1627 had various important objects in view, besides that of the valuations, and the object of the whole enquiry was to form the basis of a friendly arrangement of the conflicting interests of the crown and various important classes of the community. In order to attain this end, it was necessary to have full information on other subjects besides the teinds, and it is on that account I conceive that this report embraces a variety of topics. But I am satisfied not the less that it is the report of a subvaluation of stock and teind, such as we must now approve of, unless the plea of dereliction be well founded. In regard to that plea I think the cause should, before answer, be remitted to the Lord Ordinary, to prepare it.

LORD BALGRAY.—I entertained some doubts at first, but I came finally to be of the opinion which has been expressed by your Lordship and the Lord Justice-Clerk.

The other Judges concurred, and

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor :—“ Find that the writing founded on as a valuation by the sub-commission, is a document which might, if not barred by dereliction, be approven of by the Court as a valuation of the teinds ; but before answer, remit to the Lord Ordinary to hear parties on the subject of dereliction, and to proceed, &c.”

As there was a question of alleged dereliction of the sub-valuation still to be disposed of, their Lordships quoad ultra remitted to the Lord Ordinary.

Wilson.

In making up a record, the pursuers averred that they had “declined to complete the transaction unless additional or corroborative security should be granted for the money ;” and that the defender “offered to agree to grant the obligation quoted in the libel. Under this arrangement the bond and disposition in security libelled, bearing date October, 1826, was granted to Mr and Miss Moffat. The foregoing corroborative obligation, granted by the defender in terms of the arrangement betwixt the parties, is dated the same day with the bond, to which it makes reference, as having been previously executed.”

The defender denied this, under reference to his own statement, that, after the bond was extended, and the borrowers had signed it, the lender’s agent refused to go on with the transaction, and the defender, “on or about the date thereof,” signed the obligatory bond and that he was understood by all concerned to be a mere cautioner. The statement did not, in express terms, say whether the signature on the letter was agreed to, before the loan was definitively assented to and proceeded with ; but this appeared to be the necessary result of the statement made.

In these circumstances the pursuer pleaded, that the act 1695, c. 1, did not apply to the case. Its whole conception limited it to such obligations, of a cautionary nature, as were inserted within the same deed which contained the obligation of the principal. It referred to one who was not only bound himself for, but also “with another, conjunctly and severally, in any bond or contracts for sums of money :” and the prescription was to run in seven years “after the date of the bond,” and not from a separate cautionary letter. The whole structure of the provision in the act, showed that it was only the case, where the cautioner was in the same deed with the principal, that was contemplated by the act. And it had been so construed by a series of decisions,<sup>1</sup> in one of which (Howieson) the cautionary obligation was of even date with the principal, and was obviously pars ejusdem negotii.

The defender answered, that the statute, being remedial, should be construed so as to advance the remedy. The evil was stated, in the preamble, to be men’s over facility in engaging as cautioners : and the enactment was, that any one binding himself for and with another in a bond “or contracts for sums of money,” should be bound no longer than seven years after the date of the bond. Under the expression

The letter written by Wilson himself, on 20th December, 1831, ex-ribes the letter in question as "a collateral obligation." He was a man, and that shows his own understanding of the nature of his obli-

E.—It has been repeatedly decided, that obligations of the nature of to be made good in the present action do not fall under the act 1695, very specialty mainly rested on here, viz. that the obligation is of the does not appear to the Lord Ordinary that the obligation is properly and of such a kind as to warrant the defender's demand, that the obliait v. Wilson.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I take the same view, and I am also influenced in doing so, by the terms of the letter which has been just referred to. The obligatory letter of 20th October, 1826, was plainly granted after the date of the bond, as it bears, in gremio, to be given in respect of the bond having been granted. And although it were but a few minutes which elapsed between the granting of the bond, and the granting of the defender's obligatory letter, that is enough to exclude the operation of the statute. It may create a case of great hardship to parties, and in this instance I think it has done so; but in point of principle it is quite immaterial how long or how short is the interval between executing the principal obligation, and the collateral obligation. If parties will execute their contracts according to such a form, as to be without the reach of the statute, they cannot afterwards ask the benefit of the statute from the Court.

LORD GILLIES.—This is a very narrow case indeed, but I am not prepared to alter the interlocutor. If the obligatory letter, which refers to the bond, had, itself, been referred to in gremio of the bond, I think the statute must have applied to the case. On the other hand, if the obligatory letter had been dated but one day after the bond, it is clear that the statute could not have reached it. Between these narrow limits the point comes to be, whether the obligatory letter, dated on the same day with the bond, and referring to it, and being beyond doubt, pars ejusdem negotii, is within the reach of the statute or not. In the case of Howison, the cautioner's obligation was granted on the same day with that of the principal, and I think it clear enough that the collateral obligation in that case was treated just as a cautionary obligation, and nothing else; and also as being pars ejusdem negotii. That is therefore a direct precedent, on this important feature in the present case. And I observe, from the tenor of the defender's letter, that it narrates the bond and disposition to have been already granted, and states this as the cause why the defender executes the obligatory letter: so that the principal obligation was, in point of fact, first executed. It is true that at least a whole day did not intervene between them, but some interval there must have been: and the lapse of a day, or part of a day, is often decisive either in such a question as this, or in other questions in human affairs. In less than one day, the battle of Pharsalia was fought and won, and Pompey, who in the morning was lord of a large portion of the globe, was, before night, a fugitive and a wanderer on the face of the earth. In the present instance I think the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary should be affirmed.

LORD MACKENZIE.—This is certainly a case which is narrow in the extreme, and even more so, I apprehend, than has just been stated by my Lord Gillies. Besides the clear evidence that the obligatory letter was pars ejusdem negotii with the granting of the bond, to which bond the letter refers, it will be observed, that, by the averments of the pursuers themselves, they positively say on the record that they declined to lend the money until it was agreed by Wilson to grant the obligatory letter in question. That is clearly a letter of express "guarantee," or caution; which of course I consider to be equivalent terms; and it is evident on looking to the circumstances, and to this statement on the record, that the granting of this cautionary letter was part of the original contract. As I hold it certain therefore that the granting of this letter was, from the first, part and parcel of the contract for this loan of money, and as the letter bears the same date with the question comes to be whether it is not equally within the intention and meaning of the statute? It may be that the letter, in point of time, was a later period of the day than the bond; but, in the whole circumstances, considering the statement of the pursuers themselves, I cannot see how this affects the decision. It remains equally true, that the letter was just a part of the original contract for the loan: the bond and the letter were parts of one and the same contract. The question therefore comes to be narrowed to this fine point, whether the statute which would undoubtedly have reached Wilson's share of the contract, supposing it to have been embodied in one and the same deed, is prevented from reaching it, by the circumstance that the contract is expressed in two deeds, in place of one. The letter refers to the bond, and if a counter reference in the bond, back to the letter, be essential, it is to be seen how this is not supplied, to all intents, by the statements of the pursuers themselves on record, who are in right of the bond. No words, which have been inserted in the bond, could more clearly have made it refer to the letter, than it is proved by that statement, to have had reference to the letter, executed, and when the loan was finally assented to, and completed. I feel some difficulty in disposing of this question in a satisfactory manner. In the case of Howieson the cautionary obligation was not expressly of a cautionary nature, however clearly it may have been understood by all parties to be so; and the circumstance is a specialty which, to a certain degree, renders that case an authority on the present, in claiming the protection of the statute. Still that obligation was of the same date with the principal obligation, and was clearly par negotii, and I rather think it must be regarded as a precedent to this effect, that parties may evade the statute by merely adopting two separate writings, in place of inserting the principal and the cautionary obligation in one. But the point to be so very narrow, in holding that one and the same contract does not fall under the statute if executed in one deed, but does not fall under it, if executed by means of two deeds, that, but for the precedent of Howieson I should have doubted very much whether a remedial statute should be so restricted in its operation. And were it not for the opinions already expressed to-day, it would have been satisfactory to my mind to have had more time for consideration before this case.

No. 56.

Tait v. Wilson

GILLIES.—The averments of the pursuer, now referred to by my Lord, are so far from being founded on by the defender, that he meets them with an absolute denial.

COURT adhered on the merits, but altered as to expenses, and found the pursuer due, in respect of the narrowness and hardship of the case.

Jury Trial—Process.—This was a question of a special nature. At the jury trial a verdict was found for the defender, but subject to the effect of a judicial minute, signed at the trial by the counsel on both sides. The minute bore, that notwithstanding the verdict, it should be competent for the pursuer to prove that a certain sum of £500, referred to in the minute, was the money of the late Mrs Stewart. In order to attain this end, the pursuers raised a supplementary action, which the Lord Ordinary considered to be irregular, and from which he assoilzied, reserving to the pursuers to bring any separate and original action which might be competent. But the Court, on a reclaiming note, considering that the power of bringing the supplementary action fell within the terms of the reservation in the judicial minute, recalled the interlocutor, and remitted the case to the Lord Ordinary to proceed.

DAVIDSON presented a bill of suspension and interdict against the Magistrates of Burntisland, to prevent them carrying into effect a certain resolution. The bill contained no conclusion for suspension, but only a narrative, and then a prayer for letters of suspension in common form. The bill was served on the Magistrates, who, in their answers, objected to its formality on the score of there being no conclusion. In order to obviate this objection, an application was made by Davidson to the Lord Ordinary on the bills to allow an amendment of the bill by introducing conclusions.

The Lord Ordinary having reported the matter to the Court.

THEIR LORDSHIPS unanimously held that such amendment was competent.

1829, some disputes having arisen between the creditors and the resolved that the whole questions and differences regarding the trust should be submitted to an arbiter. A regular submission was Thoms. had intimated an opinion adverse to the creditors, in certain questi between them and the trustees, he raised action before the Magistra of Dundee against the trustees, libelling on the trust-deed, and allegi that the trustees had acted illegally and improperly in the trust affairs, which he set forth particular instances, and subsuming that he was ei payment from them of £2000, less or more, “ to enable him to extingui all or any of the debts which might have been due at the time of the tr

Martin stated on the record the amount of trust-property to be accoun ed for, at £3472, of which upwards of £800 had been distributed amon the creditors, the balance of debts unpaid exceeding £4000 of princip with interest from 1829. He averred in the eighth article of his co

In order to is, he has looked carefully through the record in this action, and into arbitral; but more especially, into the very ample and detailed notes n arbiter in 1831, and the observations upon these notes, given in and of Mr Flowerdew, extending to no less than 218 pages, and eighty-eight several heads. It was raised after the decided opinion against the claims maintained by the agent who was then maintaining these claims, and who,

of the debate, with the closed record, productions and whole process, vocates the cause; and, Primo, In respect that the summons in the inferior court does not substantially conclude for more than the sum of £2 and that the whole funds, as specified in detail on the record, for which it is alleged that the defenders were bound to account, amount only to £3472, of which £800 and upwards have confessedly been distributed among the creditors, while the balance of the pursuer's debts still remaining unpaid, considerably exceeds £4000 of principal, with interest from 1829, or a still earlier period: Finds that, even upon his own statement there can be no surplus or reversion for the pursuer, after paying his debts; and that, having stated distinctly in his summons, that whatever he may recover in the present action must be applied, in the first place, for the full payment of his said debts, he has no interest to insist in the action, except for behoof and on account of his said creditors: Finds, 2do, That none of the said creditors concur, or have made appearance in the action, or been in any way made parties thereto by the pursuer; that it is not denied that they are bound and concluded by the decreet-arbitral, which none of them have attempted to challenge, and in which they have taken payment of final dividends, and discharged and exonerated the defenders: Finds, 3tio, That the trust-deed, which is evidently framed on the assumption that the granter was utterly in in fact, went on for some considerable time thereafter, insisting to the effect in the two separate processes. In these circumstances, it does seem manifest to the Lord Ordinary, that the pursuer is merely a name, by the use of which the creditors (or their agent) are endeavouring to get the better of a decreet-arbitral, which they have no ground to impeach; and of which, in both they and the trustees have already taken and received the advantage and execution. The pursuer is made, indeed, to say that he is not a mere name; by his own admission, his interest is entirely nominal; and the parties who professes to benefit by his success, have no claim that can be maintained against the defenders, either in law or equity, in their own persons, or by an intermediary person.

“The Lord Ordinary is far from thinking it clear that the decreet-arbitral might not be held directly binding on the pursuer, as a proper res judicata, much as it fixes the fund for division among the creditors, which necessarily prehends the whole property of the bankrupt, and consequently, ascertains the most amount for which the trustees can be accountable to any party. If the fund so ascertained was more than sufficient to pay the debts, then the pursuer would, no doubt, be entitled to the reversion, and could not be prevented from claiming it in a separate action by any discharge or exoneration granted to the trustees by the creditors. But if it was ascertained to be far short of paying the debts, there seems good ground for maintaining that this should be concluded against the pursuer, and that all claim on his part was finally cut off; more especially, as, by the terms of the trust-deed, the trustees are expressly declared to be answerable for omissions, but each for his own intromissions only. It seemed reason to think also, that, on a farther investigation, it might appear that the pursuer had taken such part in the proceedings before the arbiter as to render the decreet binding on him, as a proper party. But it was thought better to rest the judgment on any questionable view of law, or on facts not distinctly established.”

intent and purposes whatsoever? Finds, 4to, That it is not denied the pursuer was fully aware of his trustees having entered into this action, and generally of the proceedings under it, and that it is admitted (condescendence, art. 12), that when applied to by the creditors, first, he gave what information was required, with a view to those proceedings, and after a state had been prepared by the arbiter, in order to the dividend, he did attest and approve of the said state, by affixing his signature to a docket thereto, on the 21st of September, 1833,—and has been previously informed that his subscription was required to enable the creditors to receive such dividend: Finds, 5to, That it appears from the documents and proceedings in process, and is not denied, that the petition for submission was framed by Mr W. Allen Flowerdew, who acted for the creditors throughout the proceedings before the arbiter, and maintained for their behoof, the very same claims and objections, which are now insisted on by the pursuer in this action; and that this action was instituted by the said W. Allen Flowerdew, as agent for the creditors, before the decret-arbitral was pronounced, but after the arbiter had pronounced his opinion; and that the said action was managed and conducted till its final issue in the inferior court entirely by the said person: Finds, 6to, That it is not specifically denied on the record of this action, and is clearly proved by the states and proceedings in the action, as compared with that record, that the whole of the points raised in this action were fully discussed and considered in these proceedings, and finally disposed of by the arbiter after very anxious and vigorous pleadings prepared by the said W. Allen Flowerdew in behalf of the creditors: Finds, 7mo, That though one of the leading grounds of complaint by the pursuer in this action is (cond. art. 8), that the de-

it is yet not competent for him, who has no personal interest in the success of these claims, and professes to maintain them only in order to obtain full (or better) payment for his creditors, thus to obtain a rehearing and a new trial for the said creditors, after their interests have been fully discussed in their own names in the submission, and finally disposed of by a decret-arbitral, under which they have settled with and discharged their defenders, and which they do not seek to impugn: 9no, Finds that the said decret-arbitral having been thus acquiesced in by all the parties to the submission, and carried into complete execution by payment to the creditors of their final dividends from the estate, and by the discharge and exoneration of the trustees, cannot now be disregarded or held nullity by the pursuer on the ground of any want of timeous prorogation or any other informality; the presumption being, that any such informalities as may have existed were passed from, and the ultimate proceedings homologated by the only parties entitled to object; and therefore and on the whole matter, sustains the defences maintained by the respondents in the advocacy, assoilzies them from all the conclusions of the complainer's original action, and decerns: Finds the said respondents entitled to their expenses."

LORD GLENLEE.—I am for adhering to the interlocutor. Let the pursuer bring a reduction of the whole proceedings under the trust deed, and call the creditors acceding; but under the present libel, which only concludes for an accounting and for payment of a certain sum, he cannot go into the enquiries he points out as to collusion. The sole question is, whether he is entitled to any further accounting. If the creditors choose to acquiesce in the decret-arbitral and relative settlement of division, it is surely not the worse, that it has been pronounced in a regular submission. But it is not necessary that there should have been such submission; the Lord Ordinary says, is, that this pursuer has no pecuniary interest.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I do not differ, generally, but I have difficulty in acceding to the interlocutor, as it stands, looking to the eighth article of the pursuer's condescendence, with the answer. His allegation is, that the trustees were persons ranked who were not entitled to be ranked. Now has he not an interest to ascertain whether persons have not been ranked without a just ground of defence?

LORD MEADOWBANK.—I agree with Lord Glenlee.

LORD MEDWYN.—From the beginning to the end of these proceedings, it is clear that this man had no expectation of a reversion. He has no patrimonial interest to pursue the action. I admit in general the rights of the grantor in the trust-conveyance, but I am not sure whether this pursuer was not to be considered as a party to the submission. If the creditors, who are alleged not to have entered into the submission, yet show themselves to have been really creditors, and upon it, this is the same as if they had submitted. These creditors, who are the only parties entitled to object, do not object, but have accepted the sums which the arbiter has found due.

THE COURT accordingly adhered, finding additional expenses due.

Gammell v.
Andersons.

Lease—Clause—Process.—1. Terms of a clause in articles of lease drawn up by the landlord's agent, under which it was held that a tenant was entitled to the value of certain ameliorations of a permanent nature on the farm, dwelling-house, and offices, as instructed by a valuation made at his entry, and another valuation, provided to be made by the articles of lease, at his removal. 2. Competent to award the expenses of the inferior court to the respondent in an advocacy, though he has not only brought no counter-advocation, but has lodged no note of additional plea, in the advocacy brought by his opponent.

In 1804, James Burnett, then proprietor of Countesswells, let the farm of Dalhibity, which was part of that estate, to James Anderson, for a term of nineteen years, at a rent of £25, payable half yearly. No lease was formally extended at the time, but "articles for a lease" were drawn up by Burnett's agent, which stated, in a very abridged form, the substance or purport of the contract, and, it was agreed, that these were "to be reduced into a regular form of a lease with all conveniency." Among the other items of these articles, the following occurred:—"Tenant allowed £5 out of first rent towards assisting putting up dwelling-house, and some timber from wood, to be valued and added to lying inventory, and walls of eleven or ten feet in height, of sufficient mason-work, to be valued at his removal, as well as timber." The "lying inventory," or, as it was sometimes termed, the heritor's inventory, here referred to, was a valuation, specifying the houses and offices, with their doors, couples, windows, &c. which was made at the date of Anderson's entry. It amounted to £4, 8s. In 1818 Andrew Gammell, who had now acquired the estate of Countesswells, agreed, by written minute, to add a term of eight years to the lease, for an additional rent of £5, during that extended term, and it was declared in the minute "that the value of the timber to be added to the lying inventory is £6, 2s. sterling, making the total inventory to be £11, 2s. sterling." This sum of £11, 2s. was composed of the £5 allowed out of the first rent, and the £6, 2s., being the value of the timber above specified.

At the end of the lease, a valuation of the house and offices was made by the sight of parties appointed by Gammell and Anderson, and the incoming tenant, estimating them at £35, 2s. 2d. Deducting from this, the amount of the lying inventory, which was £11, 2s., Anderson claimed the right of retaining the balance of £24, out of his last year's rent, as an allowance for the ameliorations for which the landlord was liable, under the articles of lease in 1804. Gammell and his commissioner refused to allow these and brought an action for payment of the rent, before the sheriff of Aberdeenshire. They pleaded that there was no obligation in the articles of lease, that the landlord should pay the amount of valuation to be made at the end of the lease; that it was merely to be a check against deterioration by the tenant; and that a landlord, especially a singular successor, could not be bound for such meliorations except by an express clause. The tenant answered, that the purpose in valuing the lying inventory at his entry was, that it should form the data in estimating ameliorations during his occupancy; that the erection of a dwelling-house was contemplated in the articles of lease, and was to be allowed £5 out of his first rent, besides certain timber, towards it; that this timber was to be valued and added to the inventory, which accordingly had been done, and no part of its value was now claimed; and that there was no object in providing for a valuation at the end of the lease, except, that both parties had understood and intended, that the value of the ameliorations should be allowed to the tenant. If the clause in the articles of lease was ambiguous, it should not be interpreted unfavourably for the tenant, as it was drawn by the agent of the landlord.

The sheriff found "that the defender was entitled to the value of the house and barn in question, exceeding the heritor's inventory;" the heritor's inventory consisted of the sum of £11, 2s., as specified in the minute extending the tack, and the farther sum of £4, 8s., being the estimated valuation made at the tenant's entry, which was distinct from the items composing the sum of £11, 2s.: and that, under deduction of these sums, the excess of ameliorations, being £19, 12s. 2d., should be deducted from the rent of £30, and the balance paid to the landlord. The sheriff found no expenses due to the tenant. After some further procedure, the sheriff adhered, and found the tenant entitled to the expenses of that portion of the procedure.

The pursuers brought an advocacy and lodged a note of additional pleas. No note of additional pleas was lodged by Anderson, the defender.

The Lord Ordinary "allowed the respondent a proof, with the object of ascertaining, whether, according to the general practice in the county of Aberdeen, when a tenant on his entry to a farm receives the inventory belonging to the landlord on said farm, at a valuation fixed by a written inventory, and under a written agreement with the landlord, allows the tenant to make meliorations upon these subjects, and agrees that the said subjects to be valued at the expiry of the lease, he, the tenant makes extensive meliorations, it is customary for the landlord to allow the incoming tenant to allow the outgoing tenant the value of the meliorations."

A proof was led, in which it was found that no cases had occurred exactly similar to the present, in regard to the terms of the articles of lease founded on by the tenant. The Lord Ordinary thereon "referred the cause simpliciter to the sheriff, and decerned, and found the a

NOTE.—It is an established rule in the general case, that a tenant, who repairs the houses on his farm, is not entitled to payment from his landlord for those meliorations, unless there is a stipulation to that effect in his lease or agreement. The present, however, is a special case. The respondent possessed a lease, prepared by the landlord's agent, by which the landlord was bound to allow £5 to assist the tenant in putting up a dwelling-house, together with some timber, to be valued and added to the lying inventory. Then came the material clause:—'And walls of eleven or ten feet of height, of suffi-effect of this clause is somewhat obscure for it is not said that the landlord

Partnership—Diligence—Cash Credit Bond.—The individual partners of a company with a descriptive denomination, granted a cash credit bond to a bank containing a clause of registration, whereby they bound themselves nominatim, company, and all future partners, for the drafts to be made by the manager of the bank, who subsequently became a partner, was charged individually by an assignee of the bank, for payment of a balance due on the credit, the letters of horning noting the terms of the bond, and directing the messenger to charge the individuals therein named, and any other partners of the company,—Held that the charge was competent, though the partner was not named in the letters.

No. 9, 1836. In the year 1824, certain individuals, ten in number, entered into a joint-stock company for the purpose of distilling, under the denomination of the "Portsoy Distillery Company." It was stipulated by the contract of co-partnery, that "to enable the company to extend their business as distillers, the whole partners shall as soon as possible apply to the Commercial Bank of Scotland, or any other banking company, for a cash credit to the extent of £1000 sterling, less or more, as may be agreed, and to grant bond therefor, and each partner shall be liable for said cash credit, to the extent and in proportion to the share or shares he holds in the company." In regard to the transference of shares, it was stipulated that "the assignee, or heir, or executor to such selling, assigning, or deceasing partner, shall take the precise place of his author or cestor."

Thereafter the company and the individual partners granted bond to the Commercial Bank of Scotland, for a cash credit, to the extent of £1000, the clause of obligation being in the following terms:—"The undersigned, we, the said John Taylor, John M'Lean, William Morrison, James Jack, John Shepherd, James Ross, James Greig, George Grant, James Smith, and Robert Webster, hereby bind and oblige, not only ourselves conjunctly and severally, as individuals, and our heirs, executors, and successors whomsoever, but also the said Portsoy Distillery Company and whole other persons who may in future become partners thereof, and their heirs, executors, and successors, and the whole stock and funds of the Portsoy Distillery Company, all conjunctly and severally, to content and pay to the managers and directors of the said Banking Company, r persons authorized as aforesaid, shall stand as drawers." By it was farther declared, "that all orders, drafts, bills, credits, antees, subscribed as aforesaid, shall fall under the obligations of l, and be binding on all the obligants, although one or more of aers of the said Distillery Company may die or retire from the r, or one or more new partners may be assumed." The bond d a clause of registration in common form.

joined the company and took up its existing liabilities, and the suspender, by becoming a partner, has placed himself, sciens et prudens, in that class of persons who were to be liable according to the express terms of the bond, and has thus laid himself open to the summary diligence competent under it. It is settled law, that letters of horning against a company, and the individual partners generally, are a sufficient warrant to the messenger to charge any particular person as a partner, leaving it to him, if he is not a partner, to seek his remedy by suspension;<sup>1</sup> it has been also decided in various cases that a citation, or even a charge against a company under a descriptive name, and against certain specified individual partners, equally as against all the individual partners of a company generally, is effectual;<sup>2</sup> following up the principle of those decisions, the charge, in the present case, must be held to have been competent.

As the bond to the bank is not signed by the suspender, and contains otherwise no warrant for summary diligence against him at the instance of the bank, the present charge is incompetent, and it might as well be maintained that summary diligence could issue against the heirs and executors of the original partners, without any constitution, as against persons in the situation of the suspender. The charge is moreover irregular and defective, inasmuch as the letters of horning set forth no warrant for raising the same against the suspender, and the will of the letters contains no warrant to charge him thereon, and this doctrine is supported by the case of the Culcreuch Cotton Company,<sup>3</sup> and the opinions of the Court in that of the Sea Insurance Company.

On advising the cases the Lord Ordinary made avizandum with the cause to the Court, and at the same time issued the subjoined note.*

* "The question here discussed may be reduced to a very short point. By the cases of Thomson v. Liddel and Company, July 2, 1812, and Forsyth v. Hare and Company, November 18, 1834, it may be considered as fully settled, that, where a mercantile company is constituted by a proper firm, by which it grants obligations, action and diligence, directed either against the company by the firm, and against the partners thereof generally, or against the company generally, without mention of the partners, must be sustained. By the case of the Culcreuch Cotton Company v. Mathie, November 27, 1822, it was decided, that a company constituted merely by a descriptive firm, never used for creating obligations, cannot sue simply by that firm, without any of the individual partners; and it seems to be implied in the decision of the House of Lords, in the case of Pollock v. the Commercial Bank, and other cases, that neither can a company trading under such ml of credit, with a clause of registration, effectually granted by all the future manager. It is to be assumed in this question, that the debt on was legally constituted under the bond, and that the suspender is a of the company, who acquired his shares posterior to the date of the bond ;

Lord Ordinary presumes it must also be taken for granted, that, in a pro-on, he must be liable for the company's obligations. The letters of horn-partners of the said Portsoy Distillery Company, personally, or at their ness, jointly and severally.' The question is, whether a charge given to spender individually, as an admitted partner of the company, though not in the letters, is a good charge.

ie Lord Ordinary is, on the whole, of opinion that the charge is sufficient.

he still thinks that the case of the Culrench Cotton Company was well
t, and that the distinction there recognised is well founded, he is sensible e present case comes to a point, which is not precisely ruled by any of the as which have been pronounced since that distinction came to be judicially l warrant for charging the suspender individually, he not being named in the bond or in the horning. There is a great deal of argument in the which does not come to the point. There can be no doubt upon the cases del, and Hare and Company, that it is no good objection that the messenust find out the partners, if the company itself is such that alone it could be ally charged. But the nicety lies in this question, whether a company can arged by such a descriptive firm, to the effect of warranting a charge of an mal partner not named, under the cover and protection of the warrant

: the firm. This is the point of difficulty, and he does not see that it is at is for the debt.

ie is, however, of opinion that the charge should be held sufficient, on the

and

would be a different question. The warrant for the charge must be found on the bond. Now the clause in the bond bears, that the individuals therein named and no others, bound and obliged themselves, the Distillery Company, and its partners, to the extent of the credit to be operated on by the manager. I say that persons, afterwards becoming partners, may not be liable under the obligation, but the question is whether it is sufficient to admit of summary proceedings against the individual charged. The clause of registration bears "consent to the registration hereof," &c. Now who consent? The parties consent for any persons not members of the company; it is only these ten individuals, then, partners of the company, who consent for themselves. Rose has no consent. The decree which is to pass can proceed solely on the consent by the parties in the bond. I doubt whether, if a cautioner in one of those credit bonds should die, the bank could charge his heir, for whom the cautioner does not consent to registration of the bond. I apprehend this could not be at least without precise and clear words affecting the heir as well as his predecessor. The Lord Ordinary goes on the cases of Pollock and the Sea-Insurance Company. But these were not cases of a charge. The parties there were brought into Court not in virtue of their consent; but in this case we must go back to the bond and to the consent given. I never could see the distinction between a company with a descriptive denomination, such as the Culdrench Cotton Company and a company firm such as Bell, Rennie, and Co., in which no individual might bear any of the names in the firm. My views on that question were those of the rest of the Court; and neither can I here agree with the opinion of the Lord Ordinary.

LORD JUSTICE CLERK.—On looking back to the decided cases, I have concluded to think that the Lord Ordinary's view is the correct one. It is now settled that merely descriptive companies cannot be charged; but it is also settled that such companies are called, amongst with the individual partners, that will be a sufficient citation. I agree that the validity of the charge in this case depends on the contents of the bond. The individuals named in the bond do not say they are the members of the company; they bind themselves and future partners, and the question subsequently comes to be, who are the partners? The bank's right is in Mr Rose, and on the principle of the decision in Thomson v. Liddle, he is entitled to charge this suspender, who, by stepping into the shoes of a former partner, has now become a partner of the company. I allow that this is a matter of novelty, yet, on the principles laid down in the note of the Lord Ordinary, I think it is not pushing the doctrine too far to extend it to the present case.

LORD GLENLEE.—I do not think it necessary to enter upon the subject of descriptive firms, but such a firm as Bell, Rennie, and Co., though it contains partners having the names appearing in the firm, is different from the Culdrench Cotton Company, bearing, as it does, the names of persons capable of bearing the persona standi. In the present case, I rather think Lord Moncreiff has taken the right view. Going back to the contract, every man who should become a member of the company is to be liable for its obligations. The registration of the bond is a company act; and we have a sufficient number of names to remove the objection of a descriptive firm, and do away with the supposition of the company bearing the obligation. Like other company acts, this is binding on every partner; but, a suspender would be liable for an act of the company in an ordinary action, and Sale—Process.—After great avizandum has been made with the title, in a ranking and sale, and a memorial and abstract have been presented whether it be regular or competent to remit the process of sale to the Ordinary, before whom the ranking remains, in order to determine if certain included in the summons of ranking and sale, and if so, should be done by it; or whether this should be done by an incidental petition to have out of the summons.

MACKENZIE of Applecross, W.S., judicial factor on the trust-estate of the late George Ross of Cromarty, presented a petition, stating that the dominium utile of the lands of Little Farnese, formed part of the trust-estate, but that from the terms of the summons of ranking and sale of Alexander Gray Ross, to whom the dominium directum of the lands belonged, it seemed to embrace the dominium utile also; that a summons was raised in 1804, and objections to it, on the above grounds, were stated by the parties then in right of the trust-estate of the late George Ross, which objections were still undisposed of; that the branch of ranking and sale, which related to the sale, had not been before the Court since 1826; and he, therefore, prayed the Court “to remit the process of ranking and sale to the Lord Fullerton, Ordinary, in far as the same is not already before his Lordship, with power to assist the petitioner as a defender therein, and to proceed

No. 63. the sale, was separated from the branch relating to the ranking, by avizandum being made with it; that this was done in the present
Dec. 10, 1836. in 1826, and a prepared state and memorial and abstract, in a Wright v. Bell. form, had been laid before the Court; that the sale had merely existed during the dependence of certain incidental procedure, and would be contrary to established practice, and highly inexpedient regard to an action so important as this, to make a remit of the matter to the Lord Ordinary, especially as every legitimate object of the petitioner could be attained by following the ordinary course of presenting incidental petition to have the dominium utile of Little Farness out of the ranking. Ferrier farther stated that it would be a departure from common form, to allow the petitioner to sist himself in the sale, in order to be heard on such a question; an incidental petition being the only proper course, as was pointed at when this subject came before the Court;<sup>1</sup> and such petition could either be disposed of by the Court directly, or after a remit to the Lord Ordinary to enquire into facts and to report.

The Court observed that as the petitioner represented parties who originally been called in the ranking and sale, he appeared to be to sist himself as a party to that process; and, as their Lordships understood to be prepared to refuse the rest of the petition, the petitioner intimated that he would not press it, but merely sist himself in the process; which he accordingly did.

g these letters, put them all up, without inventory, in a box or containing other papers; that the apprentice thereafter left Edinburgh without pointing out to his master the papers so received, and it was after his return in January 1836, when the Lord Ordinary's order had been pronounced, that he brought these papers under the care of the pursuer's agent.

The defenders, without admitting the accuracy of these averments, denied their relevancy, contending that they resolved into the statement that of due care and proper examination by the party's agent of the letters put into his hands to conduct the cause; that the letters in question could not be brought under the rule of res noviter veniens ad rem, and their production at this stage of the cause was clearly incompetent under the Judicature Act and Act of Sederunt, 11th July, minutes were this day put out for advising.

MEDWYN.—One is always unwilling to reject evidence in a question of fact unless all our forms are to be overruled, I cannot accede to this proposition: no sufficient grounds to hold that the letters which have been tendered are res noviter veniens ad notitiam. They were in the hands of a former pursuer, and were got from him by a clerk of the present agent, and even inventoried. This showed negligence, especially in a case regarding which the cause was heard and decided by the Lord Ordinary in March last, when these letters were offered to be produced. If, after the provisions in the Judicature Act and Act of Sederunt, requiring production of evidence before closing the record, we should admit additional evidence at this late stage of the proceedings, I know no reason why those rules should not be thrown aside. In the case of Wilkie v. Jackson,<sup>5</sup> in March 1834, where the M'Leay's Trustees*,<sup>1</sup> we refused when the record was closed, to allow a letter to be produced which had been along in possession of the party. The present proposal is made, not merely the closing of the record, but after proof and circumduction.

Factor loco tutoris.—A factor loco tutoris having been appointed by the Court to a pupil, on the application of the mother, without intimation being made to the pupil's nearest agnates;—The appointment recalled, as originally granted without power on the part of the Court.

Dec. 10, 1836. 2D DIVISION. F. IN May 1836, the respondent, Mr Whiteford Mackenzie, W.S. appointed factor, loco tutoris, to Mary Caroline Fowlds, a pupil child of the late William Fowlds of Skinnieland, on the application of the mother, the other respondent, Mrs Hodges, who had entered into a second marriage. The petition was intimated on the walls and minute-book, but no intimation was made to the nearest agnates.

Mrs Wodrow and Mrs Orr, the pupil's paternal aunts, now presented a petition for the recall of Mackenzie's appointment, on the ground of want of intimation; stating, that by the uniform practice of the Court all petitions for the appointment of factors loco tutoris are intimated to the pupil's nearest of kin, who thus have an opportunity of objecting to the proceedings, and that it is the duty of the party petitioning that such intimation has been given, otherwise the failure to intimate would be fatal to the appointment.<sup>2</sup>

it entitled so to do. In regard to the naming of a proper factor loco tutoris, the Court ought first to ascertain if the pupil have no male agnate. And the result of this? That you must hold communication with the next of kin on the father's side. The mother alone is not entitled to have such a factor appointed. Here a factor loco tutoris has been granted without power on the part of the Court; and to refuse to recall the appointment would be deviating from the essential principles which give the Court power to take a step of this kind.

JUSTICE-CLERK.—I am entirely of the same opinion. This is a question essentially as to power. We have no power to proceed in a matter of this kind except according to the regular and established forms. Had it been stated in the petition for Mackenzie's appointment that Mr Wodrow concurred in the appointment, the respondents' case might have been better.

MR MEADOWBANK and MEDWYN having concurred,

THE COURT recalled the appointment, reserving to the parties to apply for a new factor loco tutoris; but found no expenses due.

Trial—Process.—In the reduction of a settlement, two issues went before the Court, 1st, Whether the deed was not the deed of the deceased? and, 2d, Whether

No. 66 Scrimgeour, senior, who had died abroad. She resided abroad, and her husband pursued along with a mandatary. The following Dec. 13, 1836. Scrimgeour v. Ker.
 went to trial :—

“ 1. Whether the disposition, dated 24th September, 1798, is the deed of the late George Scrimgeour, senior, of Thornhall ?

“ 2. Whether, at and prior to the said 24th day of September, the said George Scrimgeour, senior, of Thornhall, was a person of a weak and facile mind, and easily imposed on? And whether the late George Scrimgeour, surgeon in Polmont, taking advantage of his facilities and weakness, did, by fraud or circumvention, wrongfully procure or execute the said deed, to the lesion of the said George Scrimgeour, senior, of Thornhall ? ”

In the course of the trial it appeared that various sales of the property had been made by the defenders, acting as trustees of the now deceased George Scrimgeour, junior.

The jury returned a verdict finding for the pursuers on both issues.

The defenders made a motion for a rule to show cause why a new trial should not be granted, in respect the verdict was contrary to evidence. But before going into the evidence at all, they contended that the verdict could not apply to both issues at once, because, if the evidence warranted a verdict for the pursuers on the first issue, and was so held by the jury, then the deed was not at all the deed of George Scrimgeour senior, to any legal effect whatever. And in that case, the evidence could not warrant a verdict for the pursuer on the second issue, but could only be found, in the event of the deed being actually the deed of George Scrimgeour, senior,<sup>1</sup> and having various important legal consequences as such ; as for example, in supporting all the sales made by the defenders to third parties, against any challenge which might be brought by the pursuer's instance. Since therefore the first issue applied only to the case of the disposition of 1798, being not the deed of George Scrimgeour ; and the second issue applied only to the contrary alternative, the disposition being his deed (though fraudulently impetrated from him), it was impossible that the present verdict could stand, because, in place of adopting either alternative, singly, it had found for the pursuers on both together, which was just a finding that the disposition was not the deed of George Scrimgeour, senior. Accordingly, in a recent case,<sup>2</sup> the Lord Justice-Clerk, in charging the jury, where two precisely similar issues were before them, had carefully warned them to avoid mixing up the issues in one verdict, and directed them to find upon either of them, according to the evidence.

GILLIES.—I have not formed a definitive opinion on this question, but No. 66.
 the opinion is pretty decidedly against granting the rule. There were two issues raised—the first being, whether George Scrimgeour, senior, was altogether Dec. 13, 183
 —the second, whether he was a man of facile disposition, and the deed Scrimgeour v fraudulently impetrated from him to his lesion. A verdict was returned, finding the pursuer on both issues, and I am bound to hold that the jury weighed the evidence as applicable to each issue, respectively, and were satisfied that it warranted a verdict on both the one and the other. But it is said that there is an contradiction in such a verdict: Now I cannot see that there is, for, although George Scrimgeour, senior, may have been sufficiently destitute of capacity to warrant a verdict on the first issue, he may also have been fraudulently dealt with, the deed may have been impetrated to his lesion, so as to warrant a verdict, at the same time, on the second. If there be fraud in impetrating such a deed from a man of no capacity whatever, that fraud is only the more palpable if he is of no capacity whatever. And indeed it is in general only a difference of degree, and not in kind, which subsists between the state of mind, which warrants a verdict on the first issue, and the state of mind which will warrant a verdict only on the second. It is seldom or never that a human mind is found so extinguished that it is not liable to be swayed and influenced by some passion or other; and it is not to the rare case of such idiocy, that a verdict on the first issue is limited. With these views, therefore, I incline to hold, that if George Scrimgeour, senior, was of that degree of imbecility and incapacity which would warrant a verdict on the first issue; and if measures of fraud and concealment were used in impetrating a deed to his lesion, such as would have warranted a verdict on the second issue, supposing him to have been merely a perverse disposition, then the evidence was such as to warrant a verdict attaining for the pursuer on both issues. And such I am bound hoc statu to the present verdict to be, and to deal with it on that footing.

MACKENZIE.—I incline to look on it in the same light. I think there is no contradiction in the verdict, when applied to both issues, for there is no repugnance between them. If it could be said that the jury were doubtful of the issues the evidence would warrant a verdict for the pursuers, and merely held that if it did not support the pursuers on the one issue, at least support them on the other, and had therefore returned a verdict finding both together, considering it immaterial to which of them the evidence accu-plished, that, I conceive, would have been a bad verdict, and could not have been maintained. But I am bound to hold they applied the evidence in their own manner, first to the one issue and then to the other, and satisfied themselves that it supported the pursuer on both issues; and I see nothing inconsistent in it.
in se minorem; that is a common rule: And if there was fraud in getting Scrimgeour, senior, to his lesion, so as to warrant a verdict on the second issue on account of his facility, that verdict would only be warranted as if his incapacity was such as to have warranted a verdict on the first issue, and it to have stood alone.

PRESIDENT and BALGRAY concurred.

JURORS were then directed to go into the evidence in support of the verdict. They craved that, before doing so, the notes of evi-

 Indeed v.
 Indeed.

Subsequently to this the defenders were heard, in support of motion, especially in respect to the verdict on the first issue, which alleged they had an important interest to set aside, even if they not shake the verdict on the second issue; because if the verdict on first issue was set aside, the sales made by them, in acting under trust-deed of George Scrimgeour, junior, could not afterwards be red by the pursuers, and thus they (defenders) would be saved from cost of relief and damages at the instance of the purchasers. In order to obviate this interest the pursuers put in a minute, giving up all right to challenge these sales, and also certain feus granted by the defenders after which, the defenders desisted from pressing their motion, and the Court accordingly in respect of the minute, refused it.

No. 13, 1836. ON the death of George Macleod, surgeon in Glasgow, there were heritable subjects in which he stood feudally vested, but which were truly the property of a copartnery, of which his brother, James Macleod, was the sole surviving partner. James was also entitled to his moveable succession, another brother, named John, being the immediate brother of George and his heir of conquest. John resided in America and James Macleod, M.D., was his mandatary in this country. As James Macleod and his mandatary at first disputed the fact of the existence of the copartnery, and the fact of the two heritable subjects above-mentioned, having belonged to the copartnery, James Macleod, surgeon, raised an action in January, 1834, to have both of these declared, and

The action also concluded for decree ordaining John Macleod to make up titles as heir of conquest to the heritage, and to convey it to the pursuer, James Macleod, surgeon, all at the pursuer's expense. It also concluded for £500 of expenses, less or more, in the event of opposition being offered.

Macleod v.
Macleod.

On the dependence of this action, James used inhibition against John, prohibiting him to sell or alienate "any of his lands, teinds, heritages, &c., or make any public or private alienations, &c., or contract or take debts, &c., or do any other act or deed, directly or indirectly, whereby the right to the said lands and others pertaining to him, may be anywise evicted or adjudged from him, or he denuded thereof, in defraud, and to the hurt and prejudice of the complainer, anent the implementing and fulfilling to the complainer the decree to be obtained at his instance in the said depending process, and payment making to him of the whole sums to be therein contained." Intimation of the use of this diligence was immediately given by letter from the agents of James to the agents of John, and his mandatary. No opposition was made in the action, and decree was pronounced in March 1834. But some time elapsed before John Macleod made up his titles and conveyed the heritable subjects to James. In the meantime, he sold certain heritage of his own, and became liable for the expense of a search of the records, if any incumbrance should be discovered. The purchaser caused a search to be made, and, in November, 1834, found the inhibition at the instance of James Macleod standing unrestricted, and applying generally to the whole heritage of John Macleod. John had never applied before to have it restricted, and it was now restricted, on his application, so as to cover only the two heritable subjects which he was bound to convey to James Macleod. He had incurred an account of £19, 3s. 8d., in relation to the search for incumbrances, and he and his mandatary raised an action before the magistrates of Glasgow, against James Macleod, concluding for £100, in name of damages, on account of his alleged nimious and oppressive use of the diligence of inhibition, in having directed it generally against the whole heritage of John, in place of confining it specially to the two subjects which he was required to convey to James. There was no malice alleged in the use of the diligence.

James Macleod stated that John had been sequestrated under the bankrupt act, in 1793, and had never been regularly discharged: that he was understood to be in the course of realizing any property he had in this country, in order to have the proceeds remitted to America, where he resided, and therefore contended that the use of the diligence of inhibi-

And he pleaded separately, that he had used inhibition on a dependence, according to the common style in all such cases, which was invariably of a general nature; that a special inhibition was unknown in practice, and that it was inexpedient to deviate from established style in the use of diligence, but that he had restricted his inhibition as soon as requested to do so, and that he would have done so at any time when requested. He therefore maintained that no damages were due.

The Magistrates of Glasgow found “that the inhibition complained of, was directed and used not merely against the heritable subjects in hæreditate jacente of George M’Leod, claimed by the defender as belonging to the copartnership of George M’Leod and Company, but also against the whole heritable property of the pursuer in his own right, although the action at the defender’s instance, upon which the inhibition was used, was merely an action of declarator, embracing only the heritable subjects first mentioned; and although even the conclusion for expenses in the said action was merely conditional, finds it also established; that the defender subsequently allowed the inhibition to remain on the record undischarged, unrestricted, and unknown to the pursuer, even after the settlement between the parties, with reference to the heritable subjects first mentioned, in the terms desired by the defender; that the said proceedings amount to the unwarranted, nimious, and oppressive use of legal diligence, originating, if not in mala fide, at least in culpa lata, and are relevant to subject the defender in damages; that the actual expense occasioned to the pursuer by the said proceedings is sufficiently instructed; and decerned against the defender for £40 sterling of modified damages in toto.”

James Macleod brought an advocacy, and the Lord Ordinary “altered the interlocutor complained of, sustained the defences for James M’Leod, assoilzied him from the conclusions of the action before the Magistrates of Glasgow now advocated, and decerns; and found him entitled to expenses both in this and the inferior court.”

John M’Leod and mandatary reclaimed. The Court, without calling on the respondent’s counsel, unanimously adhered.

LORD PRESIDENT.—No application was made to have the inhibition restricted prior to the period when the search occurred. The inhibition was laid on according to the common style, and I see no ground for altering the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary.

LORD BALGRAY.—I never saw an inhibition taken out in any other terms. There is no authority in law or practice for doing so. An inhibition is rendered special, only by being restricted in its operation to certain subjects, after it has first been taken out in the general terms which were used here. And the agents of

Agent and Principal—Payment—Fraud.—A party's agent, by his instructions, sold a lease; the party forwarded to the agent an assignation containing a receipt and discharge for the price, which the agent delivered up to the purchaser receiving the price:—Held, in a subsequent action by the seller against his agent and the purchaser, that no circumstances of collusion between them were established, sufficient to take off the effect of the written discharge held by the purchaser.

WILLIAM SWAN, residing at Holland House, Orkney, was proprietor of a lease of certain subjects at Cumnock, Ayrshire, on which he employed William White, writer there, as his factor, and which he instructed White to sell. White sold it for £250, and Swan executed an assignation in his favour, containing a receipt and discharge for the price, which he transmitted to White. White received the money from Baird, and delivered up the assignation to him. Swan's daughter, Mrs Traill, libelling on an alleged assignation in her favour, raised an action against White for the £250, in which action, Baird was ordered to be called for his interest. The action was ultimately dismissed, in respect that Mrs Traill held no assignation from Swan. Swan then raised an action in his own name against both White and Baird, alleging that they were acting in collusion with each other; that White was keeping back the price under Baird's directions; and that they were still liable to him, jointly and severally, for the price. White made no appearance. Baird denied the alleged collusion, and pleaded that as he had paid the money to the agent of Swan, and got an assignation containing a discharge of the price, he was entitled to be assolzied, there being nothing proved against him to deprive him of the benefit of that discharge. The Lord Ordinary proceeding upon grounds which are explained in detail in the subjoined note, decreed against the defender, William White, for whom no appearance was made, &c.; and in so far as regards the other defender, David Baird, he sustained the defences pleaded for him, assolzied him from the Swan v. Baird.

* " NOTE.—There seems to be no grounds for sustaining the action against the defender, Baird, and it appears to the Lord Ordinary that all the difficulties, experienced by the parties interested in the price of the lease, have arisen from the blunders which they, or those acting for them, committed in the conduct of the transaction. The lease belonged to the pursuer, Swan, or at least the title was vested in him. It is admitted by the pursuer, that he had employed the defender White, through the agency of his daughter, Mrs Traill, to sell the lease. The lease was accordingly sold by White to the defender, Baird, for £250, and it would appear that at first Mrs Traill had represented herself as being in right of the lease for the minute entered into between White and Baird, describes the former as 'agent and mandatary for Mrs Mary Swan or Traill, spouse of George Traill of Holland, proprietors of the subjects aftermentioned.' This was rectified, however in the assignation of the lease which was executed by the pursuer, Swan, as the true proprietor. The assignation, containing, in usual form, an acknowledgment of payment of, and a discharge of the price, was put into the hands of White by the pursuer or his daughter, in order to be delivered to the purchaser. White, holding this assignation, was clearly authorized, as the mandatary of the pursuer, to receive payment on delivery of the assignation. He did deliver the assignation to the defender, Baird, who thus holds a discharge of the price ; and while he positively avers, that the price was paid to White, the presumption arising from the delivery of that discharge is not taken off by any proof, or even positive averment, on the other side, that the price was not so paid. On the contrary, it was admitted in the proceedings, now to be mentioned, that de facto the price was paid by Baird to White. These proceedings took their rise from White's failure to pay the price to the parties for whom he received it. An action was raised, on this ground, against White, before the sheriff of Ayrshire. But by some extraordinary oversight the summons was raised, not in the name of the pursuer, Swan, but in the name of Mrs Traill, 'and the other members of the family of the said William Swan, having obtained from him an assignation to the lease in question.' It proceeds with the statement that she, and 'the other persons for whose behoof she acts,' wished to dispose of the lease, with the intention of 'dividing the proceeds among them ;' that they had disposed of it to Baird, through the intervention of William White ; a letter of White is then quoted, as showing that he had received payment of it, and the conclusion is, that White should pay the sum of £250, 'with interest thereof, from and since the same came into his hands, and in time coming, till paid,' &c. White objected to the title, and, besides other defences to the action, stated, that though the price had been lodged in the bank at Ayr, he was prevented by Mr Baird from making payment,—and that Baird, whom he represented as the principal party, ought to be called. The sheriff, after some procedure, did order Baird to be cited. Upon intimation being made to the defender, Baird, he wrote the letter of the 14th of June 1833, to the agent on the other side, stating that 'he had paid the price of the property, and got a good right thereto,' and mentioning further, that, if Mrs Traill wanted the price, she should produce the title, 'in terms of the head sheriff's judgment.' Afterwards, defences were given in in that process, in name of the defender, Baird, in which a demand was also made on the pursuers in that action, to produce the title on which they founded. Baird now denies that he ever authorized such defences to be given in,—and then does not appear to have been any express authority for such appearance. Besides the Lord Ordinary is inclined to think, that, as Baird was incidentally cited in the process, he, having taken an assignation from Swan as the true proprietor, had fair interest to state, that the different title, now founded upon by Mrs Traill ought to be produced, in order to validate his own. But what is of more importance, in the whole course of that procedure, Mrs Traill, the pursuer, repeatedly and in express terms, maintained that the price had been de facto paid by Baird to

t—Personal Objection.—Circumstances in which the rule was applied, a party takes back his carriage from the yard where it has been repaired for a considerable time, without objection, he is barred from afterwards paying the coach-builder's account in respect of alleged insufficiency of repairs.

33, Sir William Francis Elliott of Stobs and Wells ordered Dec. 13, 18

that she had no claim whatever against the former. The sheriff ultimately on the production of the letters from the brothers and sisters, and from the pursuer, Swan, decerned against White. The defender, Baird, made no defence, but White advocated; and in that advocacy the action was dismissed from the Court of Session, Ordinary, and afterwards by the Court, on the ground that the action had been expressly laid upon a particular assignation from the pursuer, Mrs Traill, and that it is admitted that no such assignation was ever granted.

In these circumstances, the present action was raised against both White and Baird. White gave in no defences, thus confirming by his silence the statements made by the pursuer of the price previously made by all parties. But the pursuer, in making decree against White at once, proceeded to make up a record with the purpose of obtaining judgment against him.

It must, of course, be pronounced against White; but the Lord Ordinary found for holding Baird to be liable. There is no doubt that White was bound to receive payment from Baird; and the delivery of the assignation to the pursuer, without a sufficient defence, unless the pursuer were to undertake, in form, to disprove the admission of payment contained in it. But he cannot aver that the price was not paid; and, on the other hand, the legal obligation arising from the delivery of the deed, is confirmed by the express statements made by Mrs Traill in the former action, statements which were admitted by the present pursuer, when he consented to, and concurred in the action. It is only farther to be remarked, that after these admissions, the pursuer had at once the means of obtaining judgment against White, a debt in this country, and whose solvency is not seriously denied, the failure in the action seems to have been entirely unnecessary, and the Lord Ordinary considers the pursuer justly liable to Baird in the

In January, 1896, Samuel Clerk, sole partner of Clerk and Co., raised an action for payment of the account, which had been rendered a considerable time before any objections were made to it as overcharged. The defender failed to prove the existence of any special contract; and the Lord Ordinary sustained the pursuer's plea, that it was too late to take an objection on account of the alleged insufficiency of repairs, after having used the carriage and harness without objection, for so long a time, especially as it was now impossible to ascertain with precision the exact state in which the carriage and harness were when they left the pursuer's premises. The Lord Ordinary, therefore, "repelled the defences, and decreed in terms of the libel," and found the defender liable in expenses.

1896. 101. LORD BALCANQUH.—In former cases the Court laid down a sound rule, which I think, should be applied here. It was that, after a gentleman takes back his carriage, and uses it for a considerable time without objection, it would be unjust to the tradesman to allow him afterwards to be dragged into a proof as to the sufficiency of the repairs at the period when they were first completed. If the employer is to object to these, he must do it tempestive. I think we should adhere.

SINCE 1827 a process had been depending, at the instance of the trustees of Mackintosh of Dalmagavie, against the trustees of Donald Macqueen of Corryburgh, of whom the late Hugh Macqueen, W.S., was the last survivor, involving questions of accounting of great patrimonial interest to Mackintosh's trust-estate. On the petition of his trustees, the respondent, Fraser, W.S., was appointed judicial factor on the estate of Corryburgh, "with the usual powers." The petition had prayed that the appointment should be "with special power to him to appear and vindicate and defend the trust-estate in all suits depending, or which may be instituted, affecting the same;" but this special power was not granted. After the factor's appointment, the Lord Ordinary, before whom the process above-mentioned was depending, appointed intimation thereof to be made to him.

Fraser declined to sist himself as a defender, on the ground that his intimation, "with the usual powers," did not entitle him so to do, and limited merely to the management of the estate; whereupon Mackintosh's trustees presented a petition, praying the Court to empower and

Dec. 14, 1836. By the Sheriff Court Act of Sederunt, 12th November, 1825, it is enacted, c. 14, § 2, that "no reclaiming petition against the judgment of the Sheriff-depute, pronounced on appeal, shall be competent."
 1st Division. Ld. Corehouse.
 Bill-Chamber. D. In January, 1834, the lands of Crossford, belonging to Lang's trustees, were let by public roup, and John Dick, sole offerer, was preferred. He got immediate possession, but as he failed to find caution satisfactory to Lang's trustees, they raised an action before the Sheriff of Lanarkshire, in May, 1834, concluding to have him ordained immediately to find caution in terms of the articles of roup or instantly to flit and remove, &c.

Defences were lodged, and, after considerable procedure, the Sheriff-substitute, in April, 1835, found the defender bound to find security, or instantly to remove; and ordained him, in ten days, to state what person he proposed as cautioner, "with certification that (if he failed) decree of removing would be pronounced."

Dick appealed to the Sheriff-depute, who, in June, 1835, pronounced an interlocutor, finding, that, from the peculiar terms of the articles of appeal, the obligation to find caution was not effectually imposed on Dick; that the action, as brought, was incompetent in the Sheriff Court; and therefore assoilzieing Dick from the action. To this interlocutor the Sheriff added the following note:—"A petition is competent against this interlocutor, as it alters that of the Sheriff-substitute."

A reclaiming petition was presented against this judgment, on considering which, the Sheriff, in October, 1835, altered, and returned to the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute. In a note appended to this interlocutor, the Sheriff stated, in regard to the competency of his receiving a reclaiming petition, against his own judgment pronounced on appeal, that, in consequence of a conversation which he had held with two of the Supreme Judges, when on Circuit at Glasgow, "the rule had been promulgated and acted upon in the Sheriff-Court of Lanarkshire since 20th May last, viz. that a petition is competent against an interlocutor of the Sheriff-depute, altering that of the Substitute, and that it is where he adheres only, that no such petition will be received;" and that, "from the obvious equity and expediency of the rule the Sheriff will act upon it, till the practice is declared incompetent in the Court of Session by one of the Divisions."

Some procedure followed, as to which, Dick guarded against being held to acquiesce in its competency, and at length a decree of removing was pronounced in terms of the petition.

A charge was given on this decree, and Dick presented a bill of suspension, on juratory caution, and pleaded, that, by the express terms of the Act of Sederunt, no reclaiming petition was competent against a judgment of the Sheriff-depute, pronounced on appeal, whether such judgment altered or affirmed that of the Sheriff-substitute; that the first judgment of the Sheriff-depute, in June, 1835, by which he altered that of the Sheriff-substitute, was the final interlocutor on the merits of the case, and could not be competently recalled in the Sheriff Court; that according to that interlocutor the whole merits of the petition had been decided in the suspender's favour, and all the subsequent proceedings inconsistent therewith, and particularly the interlocutor of October 1835, by which the Sheriff-depute altered his judgment, must be regarded as wholly inept; and accordingly that the charge was withdrawn, and a legal warrant.

The charge was answered, 1st, That the words of the Act of Sederunt

Dec. 14, 1836. Sheriff-depute adhered to the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute, that it would be unjust to extend the words to the case where he altered the judgment, taking perhaps a new view on which parties had not been heard: and, 2d, That at all events, as the rule of the Sheriff Court of Lanarkshire had been introduced with the sanction of two of Judges of the Supreme Court, and had been there acted on for some time, it could not now be altered except by Act of Sederunt. They also contended that the bill should not be passed on juratory caution, but only caution in common form.

The Lord Ordinary “passed the bill on juratory caution.” *

Lang’s Trustees reclaimed.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The words of the Act of Sederunt are quite general and unqualified, that “no reclaiming petition against the judgment of the Sheriff-depute, pronounced on appeal, shall be competent.” Under this enactment it is merely a judgment of adherence, nor is it merely a judgment of alteration, against which it is declared to be incompetent to reclaim. The incompetency applies equally to both classes of judgments, and these chargers might just as well say that the Act of Sederunt applied only where a judgment of adherence was pronounced by the Sheriff-depute, as only where a judgment of alteration was pronounced by him. I have no doubt that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary is well-founded.

LORD GILLIES.—I am of the same opinion. And I have as little doubt that this bill must be passed on juratory caution. The judgment by which the Sheriff-depute altered the interlocutor of his substitute, and assoilzied the suspender of the action, has never been competently recalled. It is true that the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute against the suspender, and the interlocutor of the Sheriff-depute in his favour, followed by the interlocutor of the Sheriff-depute against him, may be spoken of as three interlocutors, and three interlocutors they are in point of fact; but in point of law there are only two interlocutors in the case, the last of the series of three cannot receive any legal effect as an interlocutor at all, seeing that it was altogether incompetently pronounced.

LORD MACKENZIE.—I am of the same opinion; and as to the juratory ca

* “NOTE.—It is with regret that the Lord Ordinary passes this bill, because he considers the last interlocutor in the Court below well-founded on the merits. Farquharson gave permission to Thomas Watson, one of

No. 73. her tenants, who was an innkeeper, to put a boat upon the loch and fish ; in consequence of which, Mr Macdonald presented a petition to the Sheriff of Perthshire, alleging that his property surrounded the greater part of the loch, and that, if the loch was drained, the greater portion of the solum would belong to him : that he and his predecessors had possessed “ from time immemorial the exclusive and uninterrupted right of fishing in that loch, and they have constantly kept a boat thereon for that purpose ; and no boats have ever been kept upon the said loch, except by the proprietors of Invereddrie, or by their express permission.” He craved the Sheriff to prohibit Watson “ from sailing any boat upon the loch, and from fishing therein ;” and to find that he “ had no right to put a boat upon the loch,” and to ordain him to remove his boat, and to find him liable in £5, in name of damages.

Dec. 14, 1836.
Macdonald v.
Farquharson.

Mrs Farquharson and her tenant denied the allegations of exclusive possession, and contended, that in respect of Mrs Farquharson's property adjacent to the loch, she was entitled to put a boat upon it or fish in it; and that this was a right inherent in her right of property, and being meræ facultatis, could not be lost, non utendo. The sheriff allowed a proof of possession, from which it appeared that many persons were in the use of fishing in the loch, and, in particular, that some of Mrs Farquharson's tenants were so, and had never been interrupted by Macdonald. It was also proved that one party, who had for some time kept a boat on the loch, had asked and obtained leave from Mrs Farquharson's predecessor to do so.

In these circumstances Macdonald now pleaded, that as his titles contained “ fishings,” he had a good title, to which his possession was ascribable ; and that, as “ fishings,” were not in the disposition to Mrs Farquharson, and as her superior, in his charter of confirmation, had specially excepted “ fishings” out of it, there was no title to which her possession or her tenant's could be ascribed, and it must therefore be entirely disregarded.

Mrs Farquharson and her tenant answered, that, as no salmon fishing was in question, the right of fishing ex adverso of the land belonging to her, was inherent in her right of property, and that a considerable portion of the solum of the loch itself belonged to her in property ; that the exception in the superior's charter could only be pleaded by the superior; and, at any rate, it merely reserved a right of “ hunting, hawking, fishing, and fowling, as used and wont,” which was not more intended to deprive the vassal of the right of fishing in the loch, than of the right of hunting over the ground : and that in reference to such a title and the proof of possession, the petition of Macdonald ought to be dismissed.

The Sheriff assolzied from the complaint, with expenses, adding in a note to his interlocutor, dated 3d June, 1835, that it was “ settled by the decision in the case of Mackenzie against Rose, 26th May, 1830, affirmed in the House of Lords, 14th May, 1832, that a proprietor is entitled to fish (except for salmon) ex adverso of his lands, as a privilege inherent in his right of property, without any proof of possession, unless excluded for the years of prescription by another proprietor having an express grant to the fishings. Now the compeerer has produced her title deeds to the property adjoining the lake, while the pursuer has not instructed a sufficient right by title or possession to exclude her from fishing in it."

Macdonald brought an advocacy, in which the Lord Ordinary found "that Loch Shechernick, or Bainie, is bounded by the lands of the advocator and of the respondent, Mrs Farquharson, at various places, and in unequal proportions; that neither party has produced an exclusive title to fish trouts in the said loch; that the advocator has not proved that he has been in the exclusive possession of trout-fishing in the loch for the period of seven years; and therefore remitted simpliciter to the sheriff, and decerned; and found the advocator liable in expenses, both in this and the inferior court."*

Macdonald reclaimed.

LORD BALGRAY.—The reservation in the charter of Mrs Farquharson's superior, was not intended to exclude the vassal, who enjoyed the dominium utile of the property, from all right of hunting or fowling over the land, and fishing in the water. It had no such effect, but merely reserved a right to the superior to enjoy these sports notwithstanding the grant to the vassal. And as the right to all these sports is put, in this respect, upon an equal footing, and I think it clear that the superior could not have interdicted the vassal from either hunting or fishing, I can have no doubt that the vassal's titles, and the state of possession, were amply sufficient to justify the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, so far as regards a neighbouring proprietor.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I am clearly of the same opinion. As to the right of sailing a boat upon the loch, part of the solum of which belongs to Mrs Farquharson, I find it difficult to imagine on what plea this is opposed. There is no express

* "NOTE.—The Lord Ordinary has arrived at the same conclusion with the sheriff, but not exactly on the grounds expressed in the note to the interlocutor of the 3d June 1835. This is not purely a question of title, for neither party has an exclusive title; each has a colourable title for possession, and it is a possessory question exclusively which is now at issue. With regard to the proof of possession, the admitted fact that the lands of both parties bound the loch, creates a presumption that both have a right to fish trouts in it. That presumption is not redressed by any proof to the contrary on the part of the advocator. It is proved that many persons were in the use of fishing in the loch; and, in particular, some of the tenants on the respondent's lands of Broughdarg; and it is not proved that any person was interrupted by the advocator or his predecessors. The advocator avers that all the persons who had used boats, obtained permission from him or his predecessor, but that is not proved. On the contrary, it appears that Major Ross had a boat, asked and obtained liberty from the proprietor of the said lands of Broughdarg before they were acquired by the respondent, &c."

No. 73. right of boating in the titles, to be sure, but I never heard of a grant of boating or sailing before.

Dec. 14, 1836.
1st Div.

LORD MACKENZIE.—Had the advocator never put a boat upon the loch himself, and had he been in a condition to state that a boat there was a novelty and a nuisance, his plea would have been more intelligible, whether well or ill-founded. But in place of that, though he is just one of two conterminous proprietors, and does not even allege right to the whole solum of the loch, he insists on keeping his own boat upon the loch, in consequence of his right of property, and at the same time he attempts to deprive his co-proprietor of a right of the same kind. This is altogether preposterous. The reservation in the charter of Mrs Farquharson affords no colour whatever to such a plea, as that was merely a limited reservation of a right to certain sports "as used and wont," in favour of the superior, and it imposed no restriction, except to that limited extent, on the right of the vassal. And I cannot discover any grounds whatever for the interdict which the advocator is here demanding.

A party became fatuous who was the partner of a trading company; part of the company stock was heritage, which was feudally vested in the individual partners; the curator of the fatuous party took his ward out of the copartnery, and it became necessary, in order to have the value of his share paid up, that a conveyance of the heritage, so far as vested in the ward, and also of his share in the moveable stock of the company, should be executed: in these circumstances the Court granted authority to the curator to execute the requisite conveyances.

Dec. 14, 1836.

1st Division.

IN August 1836, a petition was presented to the Lord Ordinary on the Bills, stating that A B had become unable to attend to his affairs on account of mental imbecility, and praying the appointment of a curator bonis. After intimation, the Lord Ordinary made an interim appointment of William Ellis, S.S.C., to endure until the 10th sederunt day in November, and directed the petition to be boxed to the Inner-House, in order that it might there be finally disposed of. This petition was considered by the Court on November 15, and the appointment of the curator bonis was then confirmed, with the usual powers.

The party under curatory was engaged in trade with three other partners, and part of the company stock consisted of cotton-mills, and some other heritage. This was feudally vested in the four individual partners. The curator, by the advice of counsel, took the requisite steps for bringing the copartnery to an end, under the contract, for the purpose of disengaging his ward A B from the concern. The amount of his share in the company stock was then ascertained, for the purpose of being paid over to him, and it became necessary on his part to dispose of the above feudal subjects, so far as vested in him, to the other partners, and also to convey his share of the moveable property of the company to them. The curator presented a petition to the Court, stating these circumstances, and that it was necessary for him to obtain the special authority of the Court to enable him to execute the requisite conveyances. He therefore prayed the Court "to authorize the petitioner to execute and deliver all such dispositions, conveyances, and other deeds and writings as may be necessary and advisable for vesting in the persons of the other partners of the said company, according to their rights and interests, or in others on their behalf, if they so wish, the share of the whole property of the said company, heritable as well as moveable, which belonged to the said A B, on his retiring as aforesaid, in like manner as would have been done by the said A B himself had he retired therefrom when in good health."

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor, adding the subjoined note:—"In respect that the sum pursued for, under deduction of the sum of £5, 15s. 2d., admitted in the record, and subject to taxation by the auditor, is admitted to be in itself a just debt for business

* "It appears to the Lord Ordinary that the defender has taken an incorrect view of the point which he means to maintain. He holds that Mr Taylor, as Edinburgh agent, is directly and personally liable to him for the whole of the account in Mr Cox's business. Supposing he were right in this, it is still clear that Cox is the proper debtor, and that before compensation can be admitted on it, there must be a competent form for constituting the debt; because otherwise, no judgment in this case could affect or bind Cox. The defender may think that he is not bound to go against Cox, and that if he were to do so, it might seem to imply that he has not a direct claim against Taylor. The Lord Ordinary thinks that no such inference could be justly drawn, because, in any view, the claim is good against Cox, so far as the debt should be sustained, and that the proper course was to raise an action against both, as was done in the case of Greig v. Stewart and Tinning, June 12, 1811. But, supposing that the defender might competently proceed without calling Cox, at least he ought to have brought his action against Taylor, leaving it to him to call Cox in an action of relief. But he does neither. Mr Taylor could not call Cox into this action, with which he has no concern, and he could not call him in any direct action for the defender's account, because it is not due to him, and has never been constituted against him; and yet, if the plea of compensation were to be sustained, he would lose his own debt in the first instance, without obtaining any judgment on which he could immediately demand relief from Mr Cox, or which would at all bar the objections, which Mr Cox may make to the account. The Lord Ordinary, however, says nothing of any claim of retention, if a proper action were brought.

"The Lord Ordinary, in these circumstances, will refrain from giving any opinion as to the pursuer's liability for the account, assuming that the law held in the case of Greig, will apply to the case of a country agent, employed by an Edinburgh agent, unless a special usage were averred, as in Marshall v. Kerr, 1 Murray, p. 59. There may be a material distinction as to the question, whether Taylor is to be considered as the employer, between the part of the account contracted before M'Intyre's death, and that contracted after it.

"In general, the Lord Ordinary thinks that this matter should have been settled by a reference. Mr Cox being perfectly solvent, it is absurd for two agents, both employed by him, to be contending with one another at a useless expense, and as he was quite willing to settle by reference, the defender could have no cause to fear the result, assuming the account to be right. But if he saw cause to decline this, he should have brought a proper action."

lone, and that the defence resolves into a plea of compensation ; and in respect that the counter-account, on which compensation is pleaded, is altogether illiquid, and that there is no action or proceeding before the Lord Ordinary, under which a decree constituting that account as a just debt could be pronounced, to the effect of securing the pursuer, in case he were found liable for the whole, or any part of it, in his relief against Mr James Cox, the proper party in the law proceedings referred to : Finds that there are no termini habiles for the said plea of compensation in the shape in which it is here proponed : Therefore repels the defences, except to the extent admitted, reserving to the defender to bring such action as he may be advised, against the said James Cox and the defender, or either of them, and to them their defences as accords : And of new remits the accounts sued on to the auditor of Court, and supersedes further advising till the report be received, and reserves the question of expenses."

Flowerdew reclaimed, and maintained, that had Taylor admitted his liability, the plea of compensation would have been competent, but that the circumstance of his denying his liability could not affect the competency of the plea, and that therefore the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor was well founded.

Taylor reclaimed on the point of expenses.

THE COURT refused the reclaiming notes of both parties.

Property—Superior and Vassal—Udal.—Circumstances in which the Court held that certain lands in Orkney were udal lands, and were not held by feudal tenure.

In 1806, Robert Rendall, the eldest of three brothers, sold and disposed the four-penny lands of Ingsay and others, in Orkney, to his youngest brother, Samuel. Robert and Samuel died in 1809, and Samuel left a son, George, and a daughter, Mary, both in pupillarity. John Rendall, the next youngest brother to Robert, claimed the lands, in respect that, though held (as he alleged) by a feudal tenure, Robert had never made titles, and could not effectually convey them to Samuel ; but he afterwards, in the same year 1809, under reservation of his own liferent, executed a disposition of the fee of the lands, in favour of his nephew. In 1812, John Rendall obtained, in absence, and during the absence of his nephew, a reduction of that disposition, on the ground of facility, circumvention, and lesion. In 1813, he expedite a service to an ancestor named John Spence, said to have been duly infeft in 1677 and he obtained a Crown precept, on a retour of this service, under which he was infeft. Afterwards, in 1819, he sold and disposed the lands to Mrs Christian Robertson. In 1827, George Rendall, having recently come of age, raised a reduction of the decree of 1812, the titles made up by John Rendall in 1813, and the subsequent conveyance to Mrs Robertson. In the course of the action he died, and his sister, Mary Rendall, became pursuer in his place. Both the original defenders also died. The representatives of Mrs Christian Robertson were then sisted; and Mary Rendall, the pursuer, put into process a minute renouncing all right of representing her uncle, John Rendall, which was signed by herself, as well as her counsel, after which the action proceeded.

Among other pleas maintained by Mary Rendall, she insisted that the lands of Ingsay were proper udal lands, and had never been effectually feudalized; and that, in consequence of this, the conveyance, in 1806, by her uncle, Robert Rendall, to her father, was effectual, although Robert had never made up a feudal title, because he was in full possession of the lands as proprietor, and that was enough to entitle a udaller to convey them. But if this was the case, the disposition by the defender her uncle, John Rendall, in 1809, could not possibly have been to his lesion, as it disposed nothing to his nephew George, which was not his nephew's property already. And therefore the decree of reduction obtained by John Rendall in 1812, was, on that separate ground, ill-founded and reducible. On the point whether the lands were properly udal, or feudal (besides other points not now requiring notice), cases were ordered by the Lord Ordinary, and reported to the Court. The following evidence was referred to by the parties, as to the true character of the tenure of the lands:

In 1661, a Crown charter, containing the earldom of Orkney and lordship of Zetland, was granted in favour of Viscount Grandison, as trustee for the Earl of Morton. Alexander Douglas of Spynie was appointed factor, commissioner, and principal chamberlain for the earldom and lordship. In 1665, on the narrative that Robert Spence "had right and claim of right" to the four-penny lands of Ingsay, in Orkney, and for the purpose of giving him "ane better right and security thereof by the granting of the instrument of feu-farm underwritten," Douglas "gave, granted, in heritable and perpetual feu-farm, sett and lett, and be this my prt. charter, confirmed to the said Robert Spence alias Ingsay, and Margt. Seatter, his spouse, the langer leivand of them twa, in conjunct fee, and to the aires laughfullie gotten, or to be gottin, betwixt them," the lands in question. The reddendo clause was "payind therefoir yearly the said Robert Spence, &c., to the said George Viscount of Grandison, his aires, assignays and successors, their factors, &c., during the not redemption of the said earldom and lordship; and after the lawful redemption thereof to our Soverane Lord the King's Maie., his highnes aires and successors, their tacksmen, factors, chalmerlins, and others in their names, the scatt duties

The deed contained a clause of irritancy in case of failure to pay "the said feu-farm and augmentation above written, swa that two termis run togidder is the third unpayit." The warrandice was from fact and deed.

Rendall v.
Robertson's Representatives.

An instrument of sasine under this conveyance or charter, was recorded in the particular register of sasines at Kirkwall, on 20th October 1665. In 1669, a decree of reduction was obtained, at the instance of the Lord Advocate on the part of the Crown, rescinding the grant in favour of Viscount Grandison, and declaring Orkney and Zetland to be the annexed property of the Crown; and by the statute 1669, c. 13, this decree was ratified, and two former acts of annexation, in 1540 and 1612, were also ratified.

In 1677, an instrument of sasine was entered in the particular record of sasines at Kirkwall, setting forth that Robert Spence, "feu-fermerer" of the lands, "fewed be him from Alexander Douglas of Spynie," gave "heritable state and saisng, as also actual, real and corporal possession" of the lands of Ingsay to his son John Spence. The instrument narrated that the seisine proceeded on "a certain charter of alienatione and herell. dispositione, containing ane precept of saisng on the end thereof;" and that the lands of Ingsay, so conveyed, were "to be baldine in manner spect. in the said charter."

John Spence was succeeded by a son Robert (2), who made up no feudal title to the lands. Robert (2) was succeeded by a daughter, Mary, who was married to John Rendall, wright in Stromness, and who left the three sons already noticed, Robert (3), John, and Samuel. None of these parties made up any feudal title; but a settlement, executed by Mary Spence or Rendall in 1774, which was intended to convey the fee of the lands to her three sons, contained an obligation to infest by two several infestments; the one, of and under herself, for payment of one penny Scots; the other, of and under her superiors "for the yearly payment of the superior duty, cess, taxations, and others payable furth thereof, &c.; and that either by resignation or confirmation, &c." The deed contained a precept of sasine.

Mary Spence died about the year 1800, and Robert (3), who had made up no feudal title, but who entered into possession, executed, in 1806, the disposition already mentioned, in favour of his youngest brother Samuel, in which deed he described himself as "heritable udaller of the lands of Ingsay and others," and deduced his descent from John Spence, who was also described as "heritable udal proprietor

No. 76. of the lands." The disposition contained an obligation on Robert (3) to procure himself "served and retoured heir to his mother, or to any other of his said predecessors who may have died last vest and seised" in the lands, and thereupon to have himself infeft; "and being thus vested in the complete feudal right thereof," he bound himself to infeft the disponee, Samuel Rendall, by two several infeftments, &c. The deed also contained procuratory of resignation and precept of sasine.

Rendall v.
Robertson's
tives.

In reference to this state of the titles, the pursuer pleaded, 1st, The presumption was that lands situated in Orkney, in the seventeenth century, were held by udal tenure, and the onus lay on the defenders to prove the contrary. And the terms of the deed by Douglas of Spynie, in themselves implied, that a change in the tenure was intended to be made by that grant, which could only be, if the tenure was previously udal. And that deed also bore that the lands paid "scatt,"<sup>1</sup> which was properly a udal duty, or tax on udal lands; which also showed the lands of Ingay to be of this sort. Besides, the terms of the conveyances, even as late as Robert Rendall's deed in 1806, described them as udal lands. 2. They had never been effectually feudalized. Douglas of Spynie possessed no powers except what were derived from, and dependent on, the grant to Viscount Grandison, which was reduced<sup>2</sup> as null and illegal in 1669, and the decree of reduction ratified by statute. Any rights granted by him were therefore rendered void. But, separately, a udal proprietor, being allodial, and having no over-lord, could not have his lands effectually feudalized by obtaining a feu-charter from any subject-superior, but only from the crown: otherwise, there would be a subject, having a feudal vassal in lands, in which that subject had himself no superior, but was lord paramount, which was contrary to the genius of the feudal system, and altogether anomalous.<sup>3</sup> 3. From 1677 to 1806 there was no feudal title made up, and as the proprietors were all along enjoying full possession, and every right of property, on the same terms on which udallens do, this was enough of itself to have worked off the feudal tenure, even if it had been regularly and effectually ingrafted on the investiture by the grant from Douglas of Spynie. 4. If the lands were udal it was of no moment that Robert Rendall (3) had not made up a feudal title before executing the conveyance to Samuel Rendall, the pursuer's father. He was clothed with the full right of the lands by mere possession; and his conveyance, though containing clauses which were useless except in reference to a feudal holding, contained a valid and sufficient dispositive clause, which was effectual to convey the lands to Samuel Rendall.

The defenders answered, 1. There were both feudal and udal tenures in Orkney, in the seventeenth century, and there was no presumption in favour of the one more than the other. But as the earliest title-deed produced contained a feudal holding, it must be presumed retro that such was the previous holding, and there was no sufficient evidence to rebut this presumption. 2. But whatever was the previous holding, it became feudal by the charter from Douglas of Spynie to Robert (1), followed by sasine<sup>1</sup> in 1668; and again by another sasine in favour of the son of Robert in 1677. This was after the decree of reduction and the statute 1669, and showed that this feudal right, being granted with an augmentation of the rental, was not struck at by these proceedings, to which Robert (1) was not a party, and which had no object except to recover Orkney and Zetland to the crown, without injuring any heritable rights granted under the right bestowed on Viscount Grandison. The only effect of the reduction was to make the lands hold of the Crown as superior, in place of Lord Grandison. And the infestment on the precept from Chancery in 1813, showed this to be the true nature of the holding. 3. After the title was fully feudalized, the possession of the successive proprietors must be imputed to that form of their right, whether they made up a regular feudal title or not. And this was confirmed by the terms of the settlement of Mrs Mary Spence or Rendall in 1774, which, though allowed to prescribe as a conveyance, was nevertheless a good document of evidence to show in what light she had considered the tenure of her lands, which was evidently feudal. 4. As the pursuer founded on a deed conveying the lands to her father, in common feudal form, she was personally barred from objecting that they were not lands feudalized.

Rendall v.
Robertson's Representatives.

The Lord Ordinary reported the case.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I think it clear that the lands were originally udal, and that they were not effectually feudalized. They are termed king's lands, in some of the deeds, but that expression is quite immaterial as to this question. It was merely applied to them in contradistinction to bishop's lands, and did not imply that the tenure was feudal.

LORD BALGRAY.—The decree of reduction by this Court, which was ratified by statute, cut up, ab initio, the right of the party from whom the feudal grant in 1665 flowed, and that grant fell along with it. I think that the lands were originally udal, and that we cannot hold them to be feudal now.

LORD MACKENZIE.—I have no doubt that these lands were originally udal. The terms of the feudal grant itself, in 1665, afford a strong presumption of this, as they declare the purpose of the grant to be that of giving "ane better right and security thereof by the granting of the instrument of feu-farm underwritten." The question is whether they were ever duly feudalized. Supposing this to have been the case, if the right of the granter of the feu charter in 1665 to Robert

No. 76. Spence had remained unimpeached, still I think that that feu charter necessarily fell by the reduction of the right of the granter. The Crown set it aside, and I think the effect of that reduction was complete. It would have been impossible for the Crown thereafter, as feudal superiors, to have compelled feudal prestations from Robert Spence or his heirs, or proceeded against them for feudal delinquencies. I think the lands therefore stand now in their original situation of udal lands.

Dec. 15, 1836.
M'Arthur v.
Scott.

LORD GILLIES.—The granter of the charter in 1665, which was to convert the tenure of the lands from udal, into a feudal holding, had his own right reduced and set aside, not only from the date of the decree of reduction in 1669, but retro from the origin of the illegal Crown grant in his own favour. As it must now be held therefore that he had no right ab initio, I think the lands of Ingeay are still udal, and that the proceedings which were intended to feudalize them became frustrated and abortive. But at present I would not incline to pronounce any farther finding than that the tenure of the lands is udal, and remit quoad ultra to the Lord Ordinary.

THE COURT accordingly found that the lands were udal, and quoad ultra, remitted to the Lord Ordinary.

 ling, or as much thereof as they shall be found liable in, with interest thereon from and since the same was disbursed by the pursuer." The libel bore that James Cumming, the other co-obligant in the missive, was now deceased. The defenders objected to the competency of the action that the representatives of Cumming should have been called. They also pleaded defences on the merits. Scott in his replies stated that Cumming had died insolvent and unrepresented; but that, independently of this circumstance, it was unnecessary to call his representatives, because the obligation libelled on did not bind the parties jointly and severally, but each pro rata only. It formed a separate obligation, against each of the three co-obligants, to the extent of one-third of its amount, and, it would have been competent to call any of them singly, and compel him to pay his own third, without calling the others.

The magistrates "upon the footing of the conclusions of the libel being limited and restricted as agreed to in the replies to the proportions of the alleged debt due by the defenders severally and respectively, repelled the preliminary objection, that the representatives of the other obligant, Cumming, have not been cited, and with the said limitation and restriction of liability, sustained the competency of the action." They afterwards decerned in favour of Scott upon the merits. M<sup>r</sup>Arthur and Wed-dell brought an advocacy, in which the Lord Ordinary, on 9th December 1835, pronounced an interlocutor, inter alia, "decerning in terms of the libel, as explained and restricted in the pursuer's replies, against each of the defenders respectively for one-third of the said sum."

The advocates reclaimed, and the Court "recalled the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary reclaimed against, and remitted to his Lordship to hear parties as to the propriety of calling Cumming's executors as a party, and as to the necessity of allowing further proof."

The Lord Ordinary then pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the letter of relief libelled is held by both parties in the present litigation to import a several obligation, binding each of the obligants pro rata only :
 Finds that, agreeably to this construction, the conclusions of the libel against the advocates M<sup>r</sup>Arthur and Weddell were, by the replies in the

But the matter is made perfectly clear in the reply in the inferior court, in which the pursuer assigns as his reason for not calling Cumming's representatives 'that the obligants are not taken bound jointly and several in the letter of relief,' and that 'the defenders are sought to be decerned and ordained only for what part of the sum libelled they may be found liable in. The sum is two-thirds of the amount of the whole sum paid by the pursuer, with interest, as libelled, under deduction of two-thirds of the composition which has been paid by the common debtor Anderson.' And the same construction of the letter is expressly recognised by the advocates, whose eighth plea in law in their revision note is that 'the letter does not infer a joint and several obligation, but merely a pro rata.' The advocates, then, being called as bound only each for his own share and they admitting, or rather maintaining, that to be the true nature of the obligation, there is no ground for requiring the representatives of the other obligant Cumming to be made parties to the present process."

Mack v.

Dixon.

In May, 1830, Mack raised an action of relief against Dixon, before the Sheriff of Lanarkshire, concluding to have Dixon ordained to free and relieve him of the action at the instance of Allan and Simpson, and the conclusions thereof, and also of the expenses incurred by him in defending against that action. Dixon resisted this demand, but decree of relief was pronounced against him by the sheriff in January and April, 1832.

On 11th December 1830, before the original action at the instance of Allan and Simpson was advocated by Mack, his agent wrote to Dixon, stating the terms of the sheriff's judgment in that action, and adding, "I ask there are grounds for disputing the soundness of the sheriff's interdict. But as Mr Mack has an action against you, seeking relief of the same process and sums decerned for, he does not consider it incumbent on him to litigate the matter farther. I beg, therefore, to mention, that you mean to acquiesce in the sheriff's judgment, and to settle with Allan and Simpson in terms of it, unless you wish the process to be advocated, and intimate your wish to him on this point within eight days from this date." No answer was returned to this letter by Dixon.

In 1833, Mack raised a new action before the Sheriff of Lanarkshire against Dixon, concluding, inter alia, for payment of the whole expenses incurred in the advocacy of Allan and Simpson's action, as falling under the decree of relief, and as being part of the consequences of Dixon's wrongful neglect of the fencing of the pit, from which he was bound to keep Mack free. In support of this claim he contended that unless he had obtained the judgment of the sheriff to advocacy, it might have been objected by Dixon, in the subsequent action of relief, that he had not obtained an authoritative adjudication of the question of his liability; and, if the action of relief should have been taken by Dixon to the Court of Session, then, who was no party to the original action, might there have obtained judgment finding that Mack had never been truly liable to Allan and Simpson, and consequently that Dixon was not liable to relieve him of the effects of the sheriff's decree in their favour. And as Dixon returned answer to the letter of December 11, 1830, he thereby threw upon him the same necessity of acting on his own responsibility, as if no letter had been written; because Dixon, in the action of relief, would not have been barred by that letter from carrying the action of relief to the Court of Session, and if he chose, trying the question there, whether

78. Mack was properly liable to Allan and Simpson at all. Dixon answered that the final decision of the sheriff, in Allan and Simpson's action against Mack, was a sufficient adjudication of the question to have warranted every competent claim of relief against him. There was no more of an advocacy, to effect this, by a judgment in the Court of Session than there was need to carry that judgment to appeal, in order to the matter still more authoritatively decided. But, the advocacy was only unauthorized by Dixon, it was brought after Mack was distinctly certiorated that he did not desire it to be brought, which was done, precisely in terms of the letter of Mack's own agent, by sending no answer to the letter of 11th December, 1830. And as one main plea in Mack's advocacy was, that he (Dixon) was the party who ought properly to be subjected, there was no room for subjecting him in the expense of process on account of its being in rem versum of him.

The sheriff found Dixon liable in relief of the damages for which he had been subjected to Allan and Simpson, and also of the expenses of the action on his side of that action in the sheriff court, but "dismissed the action in so far as it concluded for the expenses incurred in the advocacy." He then brought an advocacy, and the Lord Ordinary found "that, after the letter of 11th December, 1830, the advocator was not entitled to advocate the original action of damages at the expense of the respondent, without obtaining his authority, or, at all events, without giving notice retracting the intimation made in the foresaid letter; found it not proved that he either obtained such authority, or gave such notice: Therefore, he decrees that the advocator has no claim against the respondent for the expense of the said advocacy, and remitted the cause simpliciter to the advocate and decerned, and found the advocator liable in expenses."

Mack reclaimed.

LORD BALGRAY.—The letter of the 11th December, 1830, is decisive of the case. The agent of Mack distinctly intimated to Dixon "that he means to quiesce in the sheriff's judgment, and to settle with Allan and Simpson, in terms of it, unless you wish the process to be advocated, and intimate your wish to Mack within eight days from this date." It is not alleged that Dixon ever intimated a wish to have the process advocated, and the effect of this letter was to entitle him to rely that no advocacy was to be taken, since he did not require it. And it is not instructed that Dixon in any way consented to the advocacy, or approved of it. The Lord Ordinary's judgment is quite right.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I concur. In regard to the expenses of the advocacy, I cannot imagine how Mack can have any claim after the letter of 11th December, 1830. It puts an end to all question on that subject.

LORD MACKENZIE.—If that letter had merely intimated that unless Dixon gave instructions as to the advocacy, Mack would proceed to act on his own responsibility, it would have been at least a different case. But, instead of that, the sheriff certiorated Dixon that an advocacy was not to be taken without his instructions.

ness. He gave no instructions, and it would be rather too much to subject him now, to the expenses of that advocacy. I consider that the advocacy was, besides, an instance of unreasonable litigation in itself.

LORD GILLIES concurred.

Pearson v.

Casamajor.

Alexander Porterfield died in 1815. The trust was accepted by the trustees appointed, one of whom, Mr Fothringham, died in 1824, and it thereafter carried on by Mr Pearson as surviving trustee. After payment of debts and expenses, and of Mrs Alexander's legacy of £500, residue of the estate amounted to upwards of £15,000.

Of the sisters of Alexander Porterfield, to whom annuities were provided by the 4th purpose of the trust, Mrs Fothringham and Mrs Paterson survived him. He was also survived by five of the residuary legatees mentioned in the deed, viz. Mary Paterson, afterwards married to James Archibald Casamajor; Helen Paterson, afterwards Mrs Bligh; Alexander Paterson; Mary-Ann Paterson, afterwards Mrs Shephard; and John Buchanan, afterwards Mrs Rynd.

In 1819, Alexander Paterson, who had now attained majority, executed a general disposition in favour of Frederick and Mrs Fothringham, whereby he made over to them and the survivor whatever funds or effects should have right to at his death, in any manner of way, and appointed them his executors. He died in the following year.

Thereafter Mary Paterson (Mrs Casamajor) died, leaving three children, Jane, Mary, and Elizabeth, having previously executed in favour of her husband a conveyance of whatever right she might have under Porterfield's trust-settlement.

In 1833, Mrs Fothringham made a trust-conveyance of her effects in favour of Messrs Pearson and Robertson, W.S., and she died in 1834. At this time, considerable arrears were due to both the annuitants, doubt having been entertained whether the income of the trust-estate would admit of their being paid in full. By Mrs Fothringham's death a portion of the capital of the trust-fund, which had been applied in payment of annuities, was set free, and fell to be divided among the various parties interested in the trust-estate.

With the view of extricating the claims of these parties, Mr Porterfield's surviving trustee brought the present process of multiple poinding.

Pearson and Robertson, W.S., as representing Mrs Fothringham, claimed to be preferred on the fund in medio; 1st, primo loco for arrears of annuity due to that lady at the time of her death; 2dly, for the fifth of the residue of the trust-estate, as directed to be paid to Alexander Paterson, in whose right the claimants now stood.

James Archibald Casamajor, the husband of Mary Paterson, claimed 1st, to be ranked for payment of one-sixth of the legacy of £1000 provided by the sixth clause of the deed to her brother George Paterson; this claim he abandoned in the course of the proceedings; 2d, he claimed alternatively, either in his own right or as the administrator-in-law of the children, to be preferred upon the fund for payment of one-fourth of the residue of the trust-estate.

ranked for the arrears of annuity due to her, and for the full of £400, hereafter, during her life.

These competing claims three questions arose :—

1. Fotheringham's trustees and Mrs Ann Porterfield maintained, under the fourth provision of the trust-deed, which was absolute and unqualified, they were entitled to be preferred, primo loco, to the annual income of the trust-estate during the subsistence of the lives of the annuitants; and that, in ascertaining the amount of the income, the interest of the special legacies declared payable by the provision of the deed, must be held to be a burden diminishing the income falling to the residuary legatees.

2. Her claimants contended, that looking to the whole deed, and to the fourth with the six provisions, the interest of the legacies was to be a burden diminishing the annuities.

3. Fotheringham's trustees pleaded, that the share of the residue was to Alexander Paterson by the fifth clause of the trust-deed, and was held to have vested in him previous to his death; the law being that, as to the vesting of such legacies, while the circumstance of the legacies being made payable to persons nominatim, known to and preferred by the testator, supported this construction; and that the right to the question was now in the trustees, under Alexander Paterson's disposition to their constituent in 1819.

4. It was answered by Casamajor and the other residuary legatees, that Fotheringham's representatives were not entitled to a share of the income by virtue of Alexander Paterson's settlement in her favour, because, under the deed, no right could vest in him till the capital of the trust or a portion thereof became "tangible" by the death of the

 c. 16, 1836.
Anderson v. Casamajor.

3. Casamajor pleaded, in support of his claim, that Mary Paterson's share of the residue belonged, in one view, to himself, in virtue either of his jus mariti or of her conveyance in his favour; or, otherwise, to his children, for whom he was administrator-in-law, in respect of the same being destined to them by the deed, as the issue of their mother.

It was answered by the other claimants that Mary Paterson's share had not vested in her so as to transmit to her children, and at all events not so as to be carried by the disposition to her husband.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor, adding the subjoined note: *—"Finds, Primo, That as the trust-deed, in the fourth

* "This cause is certainly one of great difficulty, in two points, but especially in that which stands fourth in the findings of the above interlocutor. The first point presents a considerable perplexity, by the apparent contradiction between the fourth and sixth heads of the trust purposes. But after much consideration, the Lord Ordinary is of opinion, that the provision of the annuities must take effect according to its terms, which are quite clear, unambiguous, and unqualified, except by the clauses of that provision itself. The sixth provision of the conditional legacies to George and Thomas Patersons, however it may seem to interfere with the investment of the funds for securing the annuities, contains no declaration that the annuities shall be at all diminished on account of those legacies. Although, therefore, it may be difficult to explain under what views it was that the testator regulated those legacies by the amounts of residue stated, the Lord Ordinary is satisfied that there is no such distinct expression of will to alter or restrain the provision of the annuities, as can be held legally to produce that effect. The ultimate question here is not at all between the annuitants and the legatees, George and Thomas, but solely between the residuary legatees and the annuitants. There is no doubt that the special legacies must be paid, because the free residue did exceed £15,000, and they must, of course, bear interest from the term of payment. The real question is, whether the interest of those legacies is to be held as a burden diminishing the annuities, or as a burden diminishing the ultimate residue to remain for the residuary legatees. The Lord Ordinary is of opinion, that neither by the terms of the deed, nor by any presumption as to the probable intention of the testator, can it be held, that the burden was meant to affect the annuities which were made a primary purpose of the trust. It is entirely a question of intention. But the provision of the annuities being the first in order, and from its nature, presumed to be of first importance in the testator's mind, and the words being clear, the Lord Ordinary thinks that nothing but the most express words in a later part of the deed, could be held to take away a right so explicitly given.

"There seems to be no doubt on the point which stands second in the interlocutor, that the annuitants were entitled to a full year's annuity at the second term after the testator's death. It is much the same as if he had ordered a half-year's annuity to be paid at the first term after his death. The point seemed to be conceded.

"The third finding merely comprehends certain points of fact, necessary for raising the fourth question. But it was certainly admitted in the debate, that the fact of Alexander Paterson having survived majority was sufficiently proved.

"That fourth question is the great difficulty in the case. It is purely a question

r, if they also attained marriage or majority. But though this circumstance is a peculiarity in this trust, if the shares of the capital sums invested for the issue must be dealt with in a different manner, it does not appear to the Lord that it goes a great way to solve the question here in controversy. The case of a surplus is a very simple case; and it could scarcely come to any result, unless it were supposable that it might be a question, whether even marriage or majority was necessary to vest the right. But while the terms of the will would probably exclude this last construction, the question as to the capital which were to be locked up evidently stands on a separate footing, in so far as its separate and independent quality or condition necessarily came to be added to her suspensive declarations.

The trustees are appointed to pay that part of the residue, 'as and when capital sums become tangible by the deaths of the said annuitants respectively.' means tangible to the trustees: When that event happens, they are to pay to the dividend named, 'and the survivors or survivor of them.'—Survivors of the testator. If the deed had gone no farther, the words must either have meant survivors of the testator, or survivors of the event before-mentioned. The subsequent clause will not admit of the first construction; and it seems but reasonable to suppose, that at least 'survivors' of the event was included in the expression. But the clause goes on to fix the terms of payment, which are the first term after marriage or marriage, 'or as soon after the first of the said events as the capital sums become tangible by the deaths of the annuitants respectively.' Here it is clearly contemplated, that the parties might be married or of age, while the shares could not be paid to them, the funds not being tangible. This rent, therefore, is a separate and necessary term or condition of the payment; it must be granted that the provision in favour of the survivors is a condition, with reference to the terms of marriage or majority, it is very well indeed to say, that it is not so in respect of the term before which no payment could be made to any one.

The two clauses which follow, allowing the interest or dividends to be applied to the maintenance and education of the legatees until the shares become payable, empowering the trustees to advance part of the principal sum to Alexander Gordon, if they should think it necessary, evidently have reference to this state of case, that the funds had become tangible by the death of the annuitants, yet some of the legatees were neither married nor of age; for it cannot be supposed that the trustees could exercise such a power, while the funds stood wholly

IN LIFE at the time their father and mother WOULD HAVE BEEN entitled to have received payment of their shares, HAD THEY SURVIVED,' the share shall belong, and be paid to such issue, 'and that at the periods at which such decessing parent would have received the same, had they been in life.' It is impossible to doubt that in this clause the testator had in view all the events on which the payment was suspended, and specially the decease of the annuitants. The words 'one or more' in the way they are placed, are very singular, and really must relate to the successive contingencies in the deaths of the annuitants. What is the substance of the provision? The effect of it will be best tried by looking to the case of M. Paterson. The clause necessarily supposes marriage ; so that that term of payment was necessarily past. Yet it is provided, that in the event of any of the parties dying 'before the term of payment,' ('one or more'), leaving issue, who shall be in life at the time when their father or mother would have been entitled to receive payment, 'had they survived,' the share shall belong, and be paid to such issue. The party being married, and leaving issue in life, even that issue shall take, unless it be in life at the still postponed term at which the parents, if surviving, would have been entitled to payment. Then, who is to take if the issue survived the parent, but was not in life when the money was payable? Plainly, the parent who had predeceased the child, nor any one in that parent's right ; and not the child's heir, seeing that it never was within the condition of the destination not having been in life at the period fixed. In the case supposed, the share must evidently go to the 'survivors' of the other legatees.

" But take it in another way. Mary Paterson dies, her children survive, and are in life when Mrs Fotheringham's annuity ceases. Are they not conditional institutes? The very case stated is, that they were in life at the time when Mary Paterson would have been entitled to receive payment, if she had survived ; in which it is implied, that as she did not survive, she never was entitled to receive payment, and that it is in their own right as conditional institutes, and not as substitutes through her, that the children are entitled to take the share, and exclude the other survivors. The Lord Ordinary must confess that he sees no other way in which the clause can be reasonably construed. It distinctly explains the meaning of 'survivors' in the previous clause, and renders it impossible to suppose that the testator considered the share as already vested in the married legatee, so as to enable him or her to defeat the right of the children.

" But, if the share was not vested in Mary Paterson, so as to enable her to exclude her own children, neither could it be vested either in her, or in Alexander Paterson, to the effect of excluding, by deed, the conditional institution of the other legatees surviving, in the more general case of the party dying before the capital sums were tangible, and leaving no issue. The clause seems to demonstrate, that in the estimation of the testator, the term of payment to which the survivorship peculiarly referred, was the period when the capital sums might successively be set free ; and, therefore, the Lord Ordinary is, on the whole, of opinion that it is impossible to hold that there was any vested right to render a conveyance effectual by a party who did not survive that term.

" It must necessarily follow, from the view above taken of the clause as to the case of a legatee dying, but leaving issue, that such issue must be considered as in the same place in which the parent, if surviving, would have been, and so entitle as one survivor to a share of the legacy fallen by the death of Alexander Paterson.

" The Lord Ordinary will not enter minutely into the cases cited. The late case of Marjoribanks against Brockie, February 18th, 1836, was much relied on. That was itself a very difficult case. The Lord Ordinary would have concurred in the judgment, though he must also have agreed with the Court, in not adopting the test for such cases laid down in the note of the Lord Ordinary in that case.

orm of expression in the destination to Andrew Leitch, from that which was used in all the previous branches of the destination, and the omission in some of the material words which distinctly qualified the right given in the

the only other case to which the Lord Ordinary will refer (though a great one was quoted to him), is that of Wallace against Wallace, January 28th,

He certainly thinks that case of great importance, and it seems to him, carefully considered, to afford a safe guide for the decision of this cause. There were two points in it; and the parties who maintain the vested right, naturally refer to that which is reported second in order, as the most important. That was to a simple legacy to Alexander Wallace; the deed providing, that on the death of the longest liver of the testator and his wife, the trustees should pay that to him. There was no destination over or ulterior; and the simple question was, whether that legacy had lapsed, by Alexander Wallace predeceasing Houston? It cannot be doubted, that the judgment was right, which found that it had not lapsed. But it would have been a very different case even in that case, if there had been a farther, and as in this case nominatim institution in favour of others, in case he did not survive the longest liver.

At the first part of that case appears to be the most instructive for the present case. That related to the residue of the estate, which was to be divided among the children of Alexander Wallace, 'that may be in life at the death of the longest liver of me and my said spouse'; these sums being made payable also by a majority, 'whichever of these events shall first happen after the death of the longest liver of me and my said spouse.' Then there was a provision that in the event of the death of any of the said children before their share was payable, it should accrete to the survivors equally. Nothing can be more like the present case, except that the deed there did not contain the clause, excluding from the right of the survivors the case of a child dying before the share was payable, but leaving issue. But what was the question and the ground of decision? It was entirely on the implied condition, 'si sine liberis decesserit,' qualifying the farther institution of the survivors. No one imagined or attempted to say that, independent of that special case of a child left, which stands on a fair presumption of equity, the share of the residue could have been held to belong to the child predeceasing Mrs Houston, to the effect of supporting a conveyance to a stranger. The whole pleadings and opinions assumed the reverse. Wherein does this case differ? Essentially in this only, that here the testator and one legacy of £500 to Mrs Alexander, 'the residue of the proceeds of my funds and estate shall not be sufficient for yielding the foresaid annuities hereby settled on my foresaid sisters,' the said annuitants were entitled to receive, and the trustees were bound to pay, the full annuities so provided to them during their lives respectively, so far as the residue, after those deductions, was sufficient for the purpose; and finds, that their claim to such annuities cannot be diminished or affected by the subsequent provision of the two legacies to George and Thomas Patersons, by the sixth purpose of the said trust, or by the interests accruing on those provisions: Finds, Secundo, That the annuitants were entitled to a full year's annuity at the second term after the testator's death, it being expressly provided that the annuities shall then be paid 'for the year preceding such term of payment:' Finds, Tertio, That it has been sufficiently proved, and is now admitted, that Alexander Paterson, to whom a share of the residue of the estate was provided, survived the years of majority; and finds that Mary Paterson, another of the residuary legatees, was married to the claimant, James Archibald Casamajor, many years ago; but finds it admitted, that both these parties predeceased Mrs Fotheringham, the annuitant, who died on the 31st March 1834: Finds, Quarto, That the shares of the residue of the estate, so far as the same consisted of capital sums set apart for answering the said annuities, provided to the said Mary and Alexander Patersons, by the fifth article of the purposes declared, whereby the said residue was appointed to be paid to the seven individuals therein named, share and share alike, 'and the survivors or survivor of them,' under the conditions farther therein expressed, were not so vested in the said Mary and Alexander Patersons, as to enable them effectually to dispose thereof: Finds, that the children of the said Mary Paterson, who were in life at the death of Mrs Fotheringham, are entitled, as conditional institutes, to succeed to the share appointed in the first instance to be paid to her, according to the express provision to that effect; and finds, that in the event which has incurred, the share provided to Alexander Paterson must fall to the 'survivors' of the seven legatees named, who were in life at Mrs Fotheringham's death, together with the children of Mary Paterson, surviving, to the extent of one portion thereof, in the place of Mary Paterson herself, as conditional institutes: Therefore ranks and prefers the claimants, the trustees of Mrs Fotheringham, in terms of the first article of their claim, reserving all questions as to the amount of such arrears of annuities; but repels the second claim made for them. Ranks and prefers the claimant Mr Casamajor, as administrator-in-law for his children, Jane, Mary, and Elizabeth, and their attorney and mandatories, in terms of the second alternative in the second article of his claim; but repels the claim made in his own right; and in respect that the claim made to a share of the legacy left to George Paterson was abandoned at the debate, as it had become known since the record was made up, that George Paterson had left a deed of settlement, repels the first article of Mr Casamajor's claim; ranks and prefers the claimant, Mrs Rynd, according to the second article of her claim, but supersedes consideration of her first claim, with reference to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor of the 24th March last; ranks and prefers Mr Alexander Pearson as trustee under the marriage-settlement of Mrs Helen Paterson or Bligh, in terms of his claim; ranks and prefers Mr Pearson in like manner as trustee in the marriage-settlement of Mrs Ann Paterson or Shephard, in terms of his claim; ranks and prefers the claimants, Mrs Ann Porterfield or Paterson, and her husband and mandatories, in terms of her claim; reserving all questions as to the amount of such arrears of annuities; finds no expenses due to any party; and appoints the cause to be enrolled, in order that the points remaining for consideration may be disposed of, and the multiplepinding finally extricated, on the principles of this interlocutor."

Mrs Fotheringham's Trustees, Casamajor, and Mrs Bligh severally reclaimed.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—It is on the terms of the deed itself that the claims in question are to be determined; and I agree with the construction put upon it by the Lord Ordinary. As to the annuities, it is clear that the parties provided to them were personæ predilectæ; and the Lord Ordinary is right in holding that nothing was to interfere with the payment in full of these annuities, except the single event mentioned in the deed. In regard to the other questions of the vesting of the legacies in the testator's nephews and nieces, on reading the fifth clause of the deed from beginning to end, it appears that the term of payment is made to depend on the marriage or majority of the parties; but these events are to be coupled with the tangibility of the funds. If we can discover from the deed what was the will of the testator, we must give it effect.

LORDS GLENLEE and MEADOWBANK concurred.

LORD MEDWYN.—I am of the same opinion, and would only add, in regard to the legacy of Mary Paterson transmitting to her children, that this case is still stronger than that of Wallace in favour of the right vesting, because the condition in fine liberis, which was held to be implied in Wallace's case, has been expressed in the present.

THE COURT accordingly adhered, and remitted to the Lord Ordinary to apply the findings in the interlocutor to the respective claims.

Lord Jeffrey.

SEQUEL of the case reported May 29, 1835, ante, XIII. 841, which see.

The action here in question was raised at the instance of the late Mrs Buchanan, wife of the late Andrew Buchanan of Ardenconnal, and carried on after their death by the present pursuer, their grandson and testamentary representative. It was founded on the following letter of guarantee by George and Robert Dennistoun and Co. :—" Madam—As we understand from our partner, Mr James Buchanan, that he owes you £5250, on a promissory note for that amount, dated Glasgow, 11th November, 1820, payable one day after date, we, at his request, hereby engage to guarantee said bill to the extent of the value of the stock which he may have in our house, subject to the liquidation of our debts and engagements. And we further engage, should the said stock be reduced in value to the sum of £10,000, to apprise you of the same at the time of docqueting our books. We are your most obedient servants —GEO. & ROB. DENNISTOUN & Co." Mr James Buchanan, whose bill was guaranteed by this letter, was the son of Mrs Buchanan and the father of the present pursuer.

The interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary (Mackenzie), adhered to by the Court, was as follows :—" Finds that the company of George and Robert Dennistoun and Company were validly bound, in terms of the letter of guarantee libelled, and repels the defences of want of statutory solemnity and prescription ; finds it sufficiently proven, by the admission and evidence in process, that as early as the 30th April, 1821, when a balance was struck in the said Company's books, the stock of James Buchanan was not truly, and according to a fair and reasonable estimate, of the value of £10,000, and that this was known to the said Company ; and finds that, nevertheless, the said Company did not apprise the pursuer, in terms of their obligation ; finds no ground in law on which it can be inferred that, in consequence merely of the said failure to implement their obligation, the said Company became directly and absolutely liable to pay to the pursuer the sum contained in the promissory-note to which the mid guarantee related, or interest thereon; but finds, that they did become liable to make payment to the pursuer of the said sum and interest, in so far as it may appear reasonable to believe that she would, in case of receiving due notice, in terms of the letter on the said 30th April, have been able to secure payment thereof, either out of James Buchanan's share in the Company's stock, or his other funds; but finds no sufficiently precise averments, or sufficient admissions in process, to enable the Lord Ordinary to decide on that subject, nor have the parties said that they were content to restrict themselves to the evidence in process, and therefore appoints the cause to be enrolled, that an order may be made for further procedure in relation to it."

Buchanan v
Dennistoun

The cause having returned to the Outer House, the Lord Ordinary (Jeffrey), in order to follow out the above interlocutor, appointed the parties to condescend on the subject therein referred to.

An additional record having been accordingly made up, the facts admitted appeared to be as follows:—At the date of April 30, 1821, James Buchanan was possessed of the estate of Ardenconnal, then affected by heritable debts to the extent of £25,000; in 1824, two other bonds were granted over the property, one for £500, and the other, which was in favour of Dennistoun and Company, for £3000; in September, 1826, the estate was valued by two valuers, at £28,173; at March, 1827, the real burdens had increased, from the accumulation of interest and otherwise, to £36,238; of that date, the estate was exposed at an upset price of £40,000, and sold to Sir James Colquhoun of Luss for £50,400; at and subsequent to April 1831, James Buchanan was a partner in various mercantile concerns, besides that of Dennistoun and Company; no real diligence was used by Buchanan's creditors against the lands of Ardenconnal.

The following averments were denied, or not admitted, viz. That at and subsequent to April, 1821, the whole estate of James Buchanan, including Ardenconnal, was worth more than the amount of the debt due to Mrs Buchanan, over and above the heritable burdens upon it; that the value of the lands of Ardenconnal in 1821 was equal to what they realized in 1827; that their real value was less than the price they brought; that Buchanan was urged to give securities beyond those already mentioned in implement of certain liabilities, but refused to do so, on the ground of the lands being already burdened to the utmost extent, in which view his creditors concurred; that the obligations come under by Buchanan posterior to 1821 were chiefly renewals of other obligations of prior contraction; that he suffered heavy losses about and after that date, in consequence of his connexion with companies which failed, and was not a gainer by his connexion with any com-

of the record, the Lord Ordinary appointed the cause to the parties to state whether they were prepared to renounce

No. 80. farther probation, or to have the case remitted to the jury-roll; and Dec 17, 1836. thereafter, "in respect both parties decline to renounce farther proba-Buchanan v. tion, and that the case depends on disputed facts not admitted," his Lordship pronounced an interlocutor remitting the case to the jury-roll.

The pursuer reclaimed, praying to have it found "that there are no disputed facts material to the case requiring to be ascertained by jury trial or otherwise, but that, under the admissions of parties, as well as the evidence already in process, the pursuer has sufficiently established his grounds of action, and is entitled to a decision therein."

On the note coming to be advised, the defenders objected that it was incompetent to reclaim against an interlocutor remitting to the jury-roll, which was final by the 6 Geo. IV. c. 120, § 15, and the Act of Se-derunt 1825.

The pursuer answered, that the case was altered since the union of the Jury Court with the Court of Session by the 1 Will. IV. c. 69; that the remit to the Jury Court implied a remit to a different Court, but now, the jury-roll being essentially a roll belonging to the Court of Session, an interlocutor remitting to it must be subject to be reclaimed against like any other interlocutor in that Court.

The cause having been remitted back to the Lord Ordinary, his Lordship, in order to avoid the difficulty thus raised, on a motion being made to retransmit to the Court of Session roll, made avizandum with the cause to the Inner-House.

At the advising, the pursuer contended, in terms of the prayer of his note above quoted, that, looking to the circumstances of the question, to the interlocutor of Lord Mackenzie, and the state of the facts and admissions, this case was already in a condition to be decided, and, at all events, was not a case for trial by jury.

The defenders answered, that this was a question of damages, and was contemplated as such in the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor on the merits; that as their case depended on disputed facts, and as there must be additional proof, such proof ought, according to the Judicature Act and the recent practice, to be by jury trial.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I am of opinion that it is inexpedient to have a jury trial as to this matter. In England, such a case would not have been five minutes in Court before the judge would have said it was a case for a reference. This is not a question of damages. I do not think it is yet in a fit state for decision; but any additional evidence should be taken by commission.

The other Judges having concurred,

THE COURT found, "that the matters now in dispute between the parties are not proper for being tried by a jury, and therefore remitted to the Lord Ordinary, with instructions to retransmit the case to his Court of Session roll; and, in regard to such farther proof as may be offered on either side, to appoint the same to be taken by commission."

Bankruptcy—Sequestration—Diligence—Public Record.—Letters of horning were issued against a debtor on 27th February, 1834, and a charge given, which was followed by denunciation in March, the letters and executions being then duly registered and marked; in 1836 a second charge was given on the same letters, and the debtor denounced, when the execution of charge and the denunciation were duly recorded, but the letters were not again registered or marked, reference being merely made to them in the execution of horning;—Held, on a petition for sequestration at the instance of the creditor, that the evidence of bankruptcy was not objectionable on the ground of the letters wanting a certificate of registration in 1836.

On the 27th February, 1834, letters of horning were issued at the instance of the National Bank, in virtue of which a charge was given to the respondent Johnstone, and denunciation followed on the 13th March; the letters and executions being recorded and duly marked on the same day. This diligence was not proceeded with; but, on 10th November, 1836, a second charge was given to Johnstone on the same letters, and he was denounced on the 17th. The execution of horning and the denunciation were registered the same day, each of them being marked as registered of that date by the keeper of the record. The execution of horning was not recorded at length but in an abridged form.* The * Execution of Charge of Horning.

[The parts printed within brackets are not in the Record.]

Upon the 10th day of November eighteen hundred and thirty-six years [by virtue of letters of horning, dated and signeted the twenty-seventh day of February eighteen hundred and thirty-four years, raised at the instance of the National Bank of Scotland], I, Robert M'Lellan, messenger-at-arms [passed, and in his Majesty's name and authority, lawfully commanded and] charged Thomas Johnstone, writer in Dumfries, to pay to the said National Bank of Scotland the [principal] sum of one hundred and eighty pounds sterling, and interest thereon, since due, and till paid, contained in and due by a bill, dated the 1st day of June eighteen hundred and thirty-three years, drawn by the said Thomas Johnstone upon, and accepted by George Adamson, draper in Dumfries [payable four months after date, indorsed by the said drawer to the said National Bank of Scotland, at whose instance the said bill was duly protested, and the protest registered, as narrated in said letters], deducting always the sum of sixty-five pounds eleven shillings paid in account of said bill, upon the seventh day of August, and twelve pounds on the twenty-fourth day of September, both in the year eighteen hundred and thirty-four [and that within six days next after the date hereof, under the pain of imprisonment and putting of him to the horn; with certification, conform to the said] and giving a copy of charge whereof, to the effect foresaid, I left for the said Johnstone, with a woman within his dwelling-house, in High Street, and gave to him [as I could not apprehend himself personally, which

81. letters of horning were not so registered or marked, but reference was merely made to them in the execution of horning as dated and signeted in 1834.

Thereafter the bank presented a petition to have Johnstone sequestered under the Act 54 Geo. III. c. 137, as under legal diligence by the horning and caption at their instance. To the competency of this application Johnstone objected, that the legal and statutory evidence of bankruptcy had not been produced, contending that the formalities of the Act 1579, c. 75, which regulates the registration of letters of horning and executions, had not been complied with, and, particularly, that the letters of horning founded on ought to have borne a certificate of their registration in November, 1836.

It was also objected that the execution had not been recorded in terms of the act, and in such a manner as to admit of an "authentic" extract thereof being made.

It was answered for the Bank, that, the letters of horning having been already registered and marked in 1834, it was unnecessary to have this form gone through a second time in 1836; and that the manner in which the execution was recorded was conform to the practice in the Register of Edinburgh for the last 40 years.

THE COURT repelled both objections, and granted sequestration.

20, 1836. ALEXANDER LOW, accountant in Edinburgh, being elected trustee of the estate of Falkner and Cunningham, wine merchants in Edinburgh, stated in his petition for confirmation, that, at the meeting of creditors

The petition, besides praying for confirmation, in common form, farther craved the Court "also to approve of the foresaid resolution of the meeting of the bankrupts' creditors, and authorize the petitioner to accept of any offer that may be made to him for the purchase of the bankrupts' whole stock in trade, including counting-room and cellar furniture, by private bargain, on such terms and conditions as he conceives to be of advantage to the estate." At moving the petition,

LORD PRESIDENT.—In so far as the petition prays for confirmation in common form, it should be granted, but no farther. In regard to any private offer which may be made to the petitioner for the purchase of the bankrupts' stock in trade, he must just judge for himself and act on his own responsibility: at least there is nothing stated at present to justify us in granting him any special authority on the subject.

The petitioner then intimated that he restricted the prayer of his petition to confirmation in common form, which was accordingly granted.

Entail—Process.—1. A party disposed his lands in liferent to a lady, and in fee to the second son to be procreated of her body, and his issue, whom failing, other heirs; he died two years before the lady's second son was born; the fetters were imposed upon the lady, and the "heirs" of entail: Held that there was no peculiarity in the case to exempt it from the general rule that the fetters of an entail which are laid upon heirs, do not bind the institute. 2. Held by the Lord Ordinary and acquiesced in, that the institute under an entail, in pursuing a declarator of freedom from the fetters of the entail, should call the whole heirs of entail as parties.*

In 1793, John Maxwell of Fingalton executed a conveyance of that estate, on the narrative of affectionate regard for Mrs Margaret Mitchell, wife of Walter Logan, junior, merchant in Glasgow, and that he had always intended her "to succeed him in his estate after his death." By Dec. 20, 18
Ld. Corehen

83. this deed he disposed the estate "to the said Margaret Mitchell in life-rent only, during her lifetime after me, and to the second son to be lawfully procreated of her body, and the heirs to be lawfully procreated of his body; whom failing, to the next youngest son to be lawfully procreated of her body, and the heirs to be procreated of his body," &c. whom failing, to her other children in a certain order. John Maxwell died in 1798, and John Logan Maxwell, the second son of Mrs Mitchell or Logan, was not born for two years afterwards.

1836

The deed executed by John Maxwell of Fingalton was in the form of a strict entail. The prohibitory clause declared that it should "not be lawful to the said Margaret Mitchell, or any of the heirs aforesaid, to alter" the order of succession, &c. In like manner the irritant and resolute clauses were directed against "the said Margaret Mitchell, or any of the heirs hereby called to the succession."

In one of the conditions of the entail, imposing the obligation to carry the name and arms of Maxwell of Fingalton, it was declared "that the second lawful son of the said Margaret Mitchell and the heirs of his body, and the whole other heirs substituted by this deed, whether male or female, and the descendants of their bodies," &c. should be under that obligation, "and if the said second son, or any of the heirs so succeeding, shall do in the contrary thereof, then, and in that case, the person so contravening, shall for him or herself alone, ipso facto amit, lose," &c.

In 1816, John Logan Maxwell was served heir of entail and provision to John Maxwell of Fingalton under the entail, and he took infestment under all the burdens, provisions, and conditions contained in the entail.

In 1834 he raised a declarator that the fetters of the entail did not apply to him, as he was the institute, but only to the heirs of entail, and that he was at liberty to sell the estate, or alter the order of succession at pleasure. The substitute heirs, including Mrs Catherine Logan or Gill, and Archibald Speirs Logan, residing in India, pleaded as a dilatory defence, that the whole heirs of entail should have been made parties; and in particular that the infant son of Archibald Speirs Logan had been cited as forth of Scotland, but his tutors and curators were not called; and that the children of Mrs Catherine Logan or Gill had not been called; and it was doubted whether the appointment of a tutor ad litem, which had been made to these absent parties, was valid.

The Lord Ordinary "sustained the preliminary defences to the effect of sisting process till Logan, son of Archibald Speirs Logan; and Walter Gill, &c. (children of Mrs Logan or Gill), and their tutors and curators, as well as all the other heirs of entail to the lands libelled, who have not been already cited, or have not entered appearance, be duly called as parties." A supplementary summons was then raised, duly calling the omitted heirs; and it was pleaded by the defenders on the merits, that, by the true construction of the entail, the pursuer was bound under its fetters. The substitute heirs afterwards raised a counter-declarator against John Logan Maxwell, to have it found that the fetters applied to him "as institute, or first person called under the entail," and that he should be interdicted from selling or affecting the lands to the prejudice of the entail. No. 53

Maxwell v.
Logan.

The substitute heirs admitted the general rule to be indisputably fixed, that fetters which were imposed only upon heirs, would not bind the institute, however clearly it might be the intention of the entailer to have bound him, but they contended that the general rule did not apply here, because, 1st, John Logan Maxwell was not born for two years after the entailer's death. During that period the fee of the entailed estate, which could not be in pendent, was necessarily in Mrs Mitchell or Logan, either as fiduciary fiar or otherwise. In consequence of this, John Logan Maxwell could not take up the estate without a service,<sup>1</sup> which proved that he took as heir and not as institute: and accordingly he had expedite a service as heir of provision and entail in 1816. 2. As the fetters were effectually imposed on Mrs Mitchell or Logan, who was called before John Logan Maxwell, this was a peculiarity distinguishing the case from every preceding decision, because in all former cases, the institute who claimed exemption from the fetters, had been called before any of the parties on whom the fetters were effectually imposed. 3. John Logan Maxwell was personally barred, after stamping himself with the character of heir by his service, from claiming any rights inconsistent with that character, so long as the service stood unreduced. 4. No right whatever had vested or could vest in him during the lifetime of Mrs Mitchell or Logan, who still survived.

John Logan Maxwell answered, 1. If he was truly the institute under the entail, then the precedents of Duntreath, &c. directly applied. And he was the institute by the terms of the disposition.<sup>2</sup> He was not indeed called nominatim, because he was not born at the date of the deed; but he was designated and individualized as distinctly as if named, by being described as the second son of Mrs Mitchell or Logan. The disposition conveyed the liferent only to her, and it was as disponent that he took the fee. The service took nothing out of the hereditas jacens of the entailer under the entail, because the entailed disposition itself included every thing, and effectually conveyed away both fee and liferent from the entailer. The service had merely the declaratory effect of instructing that John Logan Maxwell was the disponent or institute under the entail; and a process of declarator in this Court would equally have served the purpose of enabling him to take infeftment under the precept or procura in the disposition, by legally certiorating the notary that he was the

83. disponee. 2. Though the fetters were imposed on Mrs Logan, the life-renter, that was of no importance unless they were also laid on the institute. 3. In the greater part of the cases in which entails were challenged the pursuer had made up titles under the entail, and was never held barred by that circumstance from bringing his challenge. And although the pursuer's title here was made up under the fetters of the Fingalton entail, yet, if these did not reach him, he was entitled to decree notwithstanding his service. 4. The full right of fee was already vested in him but burdened with the liferent of his mother, Mrs Mitchell or Logan.

The Lord Ordinary "in the action at the instance of John Maxwell Logan, decerned in terms of the conclusion of the libel; and in the action at the instance of Mrs Catherine Cameron Logan or Gill, assoilzied the defender, and decerned; and in these conjoined actions, found the said John Maxwell Logan entitled to expenses." *

Mrs Gill and others reclaimed, and, inter alia, explained that there was an inadvertency in the note of the Lord Ordinary as to a matter of fact, in supposing that John Logan Maxwell had served heir to his mother; as she was still alive, and it was to John Maxwell, the entailer, that he had served.

LORD PRESIDENT.—That makes no difference whatever. The interlocutor on the merits is clearly right. But I think it should be altered as to expenses. John Logan Maxwell wishes to have a clear and indisputable right to the estate in fee-simple, and it is very much for his benefit that he has had his right tried in fore and decided on.

The other Judges concurred, and

THE COURT altered as to expenses, but unanimously adhered on the merits.

* "NOTE.—The Lord Ordinary hopes it is no longer necessary to state the grounds of a judgment finding, that the fetters of an entail, imposed upon heirs only, do not bind the institute. If it be, no point in the law of Scotland can be held as settled. The attempt to show that John Maxwell Logan is not the institute, but an heir of entail, it is thought has entirely failed. The estate is conveyed to his mother in liferent, for her liferent use only, and to her second son; the fee vested in the second son Maxwell Logan ipso jure as soon as he came into existence as institute. No fee could be transmitted to him from his mother; if he served heir to her, it was for the purpose, not of acquiring, but of declaring a right to the estate. None of the decisions cited by the substitute heirs bear upon the case."

Submission—Servitude—Pasturage.—The terms of a decree-arbitral were what ambiguous, in defining a servitude-right of cutting reeds and rushes in a loch, as combined with a servitude-right of pasturage on the space between summer-margin of the loch and its winter flood-mark : a proof was allowed as to condition of the loch, and rushes, &c., and of the practice in using the servitude considering which, decree was pronounced in terms of the decree-arbitral thereby elucidated.

ROBERT REID CUNINGHAME of Auchinharvie, Lieut.-General James Dec. 20, 18 op of Dunlop and Lochwood, and Mrs Hunt of Ashgrove, were 1st Division minous proprietors in Ayrshire, and were at variance as to their respec- Ld. Coreho ights of property and servitude in the Loch of Stevenson, which was B. unded by their grounds. Lochwood was the name of the property eneral Dunlop, which adjoined the loch. They entered into a sub-on of these differences to Mr James Ferguson, advocate, who, in , pronounced a decree-arbitral finding that the property of the loch ged to Cuninghame ; “ that none of the other parties in this sub-on have any right to the property of this loch, by any grant or ex-on in their title-deeds, but that they have satisfactorily proven that of them has severally enjoyed the right of fishing and shooting in och, and of cutting reeds and rushes within the same, opposite to anks of their lands, and of pasturing within the space overflowed by ch in winter, as far as cattle can reach within the water-marks at seasons, as part and pertinent of these.” The decree therefore dethe property of the loch to be in Cuninghame, “ but subject to of servitude, which I hereby find, decern, and declare, now and in ne coming, to belong to each of the said Mrs Hunt and General op, and their heirs and successors, of fishing and shooting in the ch at their pleasure, and also of pasturing at low water in the same, utting reeds and rushes within the same, opposite to the banks lands severally belonging to them in property.”

1832 Robert Cuninghame, now of Auchinharvie, presented a peti-to the Sheriff of Ayrshire, stating that James Robertson, tenant in of the land, was altering the level of the loch by making drains of im-depth, for the purpose of reducing the quantity of surface covered by water, and thereby extending illegally the servitude of pasturage ; that he was not merely using the servient tenement for the purpose of cutting on it, but by an unwarrantable encroachment on the he cut the grass upon it and made it into hay. Cun-

No. 84. inghame therefore craved interdict against Robertson, and his landlord, now John Dunlop of Dunlop, prohibiting them from continuing the practice complained of.

Answers were lodged by these parties, stating that, under the terms of the decree-arbitral, they enjoyed not only a right of pasturage, which included the privilege of cutting the grass on the pasturage-land, for the cattle of the dominant tenement, but also a right of cutting the reeds and rushes within or beside the loch, which could not be done, without cutting all the grass which was growing interspersed with the reeds. Statements in defence were also made in respect to the alleged improper draining. The petitioner denied that this was the meaning of the decree-arbitral, and alleged that the reeds and rushes there referred to were a species of large bullrushes, which grew within the lake in deep water; that these had nothing to do with the pasturage of cattle, though useful for other purposes, and that the right of cutting was limited exclusively to them, leaving nothing but a mere servitude of pasturage on the ground between high and low water mark.

The Sheriff allowed a proof, intimating that the terms of the decree-arbitral were somewhat ambiguous, and that he was chiefly desirous of ascertaining whether the right of cutting reeds and rushes, allowed in the decree-arbitral, especially when taken in conjunction with the right of pasturage there allowed, could imply any thing less than the right of cutting the grass as well as pasturing on it. On considering a proof relative to the condition of the reeds and rushes in the loch, and the practice of cutting them, the Sheriff assailed from the petition, observing, that he considered the right of cutting reached not only to the greater reeds or bullrushes which grew in deep water, but also to the smaller and more delicate rushes or thrushes growing between the high and low water marks, and that in cutting these the right of cutting the herbage, which was more or less interspersed with them, was included, especially as there was a servitude of pasturage there.

Cuninghame brought an advocation, and afterwards raised a declarator for the purpose of having the same rights declared, which he had asserted in the petition for interdict. In the declarator certain other proprietors were called besides Dunlop. That action, under an exception as to some of the parties, was conjoined with the advocation, and the Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—"Recals the interlocutor of the Sheriff; finds that the rights of all the parties, in so far as the questions at issue in this process are concerned, must be regulated by the decree-arbitral pronounced by James Ferguson, Esq. in 1807; finds that, under that decree, the defenders have right to a servitude of pasturage at low water in the Loch of Stevenson, and cutting reeds and rushes within the same, opposite to the banks of the lauds severally belonging to them in property; finds that, under a servitude of pasturage, the defenders are not entitled to cut and carry off, or to make into hay, the grass or herb on the ground over which the servitude extends, except in so far as it is unavoidable in cutting rushes or reeds; finds it proved, that the terms rushes and reeds in the decree-arbital, import the large rushes or bull-rushes, and the reeds growing on the side or within the loch, as described in the proof, neither of which plants is proper as fodder for cattle, or generally used for that purpose; finds that these terms do not comprehend sprits or sprats, a species of coarse grass or herbage, which is fit, and generally used for fodder, and which cannot be cut with the scythe, without at the same time cutting the grass or other plants among which they grow; and in respect it is not denied that the defender, John Dunlop, or his tenants, have cut and carried off, or made into hay, coarse herbage or grass, grants the interdict as craved in that matter, and decerns; and, before further answer, allows the pursuer a proof of the averments contained in the sixth and seventh articles of his condescendence, and to the defenders a conjunct probation." *

No. 84.

Dec. 20, 18;

* "NOTE.—These actions have been brought to ascertain the meaning of a decree-arbital pronounced by Mr Ferguson in 1807, and to enforce it; by which decree all the parties are bound, or have consented to be bound, in so far as the questions at issue are concerned.

"It is settled that the Loch of Stevenson, that is, the water with the ground it covers, is the exclusive property of the pursuer, Mr Cuninghame, and the first question is, whether Mr Dunlop and his tenants, under a servitude of pasturage to which he has right by the decree, and which extends over the ground covered by the loch when full, but left dry when the water subsides, are entitled to make into hay, and carry off the herbage growing there? To the Lord Ordinary it appears that they are not entitled. A servitude of pasturage is a limited right, well known in the law of Scotland. The proprietor of the dominant tenement is entitled to feed the cattle of that tenement on the servient tenement; and if he keep no cattle on the dominant tenement, or not enough to consume the pasture, the owner of the servient tenement is entitled to use the whole grass, or the surplus. If the servitude man were allowed to cut and carry off the grass in the shape of hay, he might sell it without restriction as to quantity, or use it for purposes having no connexion with pasturage. Further, pasturing cattle improves the ground on which they feed, whereas making the crop into hay tends to impoverish it; and accordingly it is believed that no such right is understood to be included in the grant of a servitude of pasturage. It is said, however, that the defenders are entitled to do this under the finding in the decree-arbital, by which they are allowed to cut rushes and reeds. But this matter is well explained in the proof by the witnesses cited for the pursuer. There are large rushes or bullrushes growing by the side of the loch, and also a considerable way within the water, sometimes reaching the height of six or eight feet, and as thick as a goose-quill. These are altogether unfit for fodder, but are cut for thatch to houses, stacks, and similar purposes. There are also reeds equally unfit for fodder, but used by shoopers and other tradesmen. Both of these may be cut without interfering with the herbage. But there is likewise a small plant, called a sprat or spirit in Scotland, which grows not merely by the side of lakes, but generally where there is wet ground, or where the subsoil is wet, and which constitutes a principal part of the herbage of such ground, and is relished by the cattle. These plants are sometimes called rushes, or in Scotland, thrashes, and not improperly, for though of a different quality from a bullrush, they have an affinity to the tribe. Giving a liberty to cut rushes and reeds, could not have had any effect, otherwise he would have found at once that the defenders

THE COURT, without calling on the pursuer's counsel to support the judgment, unanimously adhered.

LORD GILLIES.—The servitude of pasturage is quite well known and well defined in the law of Scotland. I never saw an attempt made to interpret it into a right of cutting down the grass and making hay of it.

LORD MACKENZIE.—Servitudes are to be strictly construed, and the proprietor has a right to confine the servitude of pasturage within its true limits.

might cut the whole herbage by the side of the loch; for it is impossible to separate the one from the other. The same thing may be said of paddock or paddock-pipes (equisetum or horse-tail), a small plant intimately mixed with the grass in wet places.

"The question with regard to cutting herbage was properly raised before the Sheriff; a proof was competently allowed, and being ready for decision, the Lord Ordinary has given judgment upon it.

"But the other question is in a different situation. The arbiter found that the property of the loch is in the pursuer, who avers that some of the defenders, or their tenants, with a view to increase the extent and value of their right of pasturage, cut a drain or drains from the loch, or unnecessarily deepened the aqueduct to the mill, by which he is deprived of part of his property, or the servitude improperly extended. Some evidence was taken before the Sheriff on that point, but the greater part of it relates to acts done fourteen or fifteen years before, and which, therefore, could not be completely proved in the possessory action. That evidence, therefore, is irregular, and cannot be referred to, unless parties consent to abide by it, which they have not done. Undoubtedly, Messrs Hamilton and Warner are entitled to clear out their aqueduct, but they are not entitled to deepen it, unless a supply of water, according to use and wont, cannot otherwise be procured. If the drain or aqueduct was unwarrantably made, it is thought the pursuer is entitled to counteract its effects, by raising a mound to restore the loch to its original size, which may be discovered, if, as he alleges, it was originally bounded by march-stones. But if, on the contrary, no such illegal act is proved, it may be doubted whether the march-stones will be of any advantage to him, for the arbiter has made no provision for the case of the loch being diminished, gradually and slowly, by the accumulation of soil in the basin from natural causes; and in that case, it may be thought that the rights of parties will be regulated by its varying magnitude. But this point is left for argument, after the proof now allowed has been taken. It is not probable, however, that its surface should have been diminished in that way, to the extent of twenty acres since 1807, the difference, as is alleged, between its size then and at the present time."

agent, Mr Goldie, made affidavit, that Lord Moncreiff, in adjournment, had given the jury in charge to two sheriff-officers, to whom he administered an oath: "That, thereafter, the said officers accompanied the jury from the court-house to the Commercial Inn: That Robert Neilson, another sheriff-officer, who had not been named and appointed in charge of the jury, and who is a nephew of the defender M'Whir, accompanied the two officers, Richardson and Dickson, and accompanied them to the Commercial Inn: That, on going there, Dickson, first, asked Neilson why he came, as Lord Moncreiff had not named him? and Neilson answered, that he had been directed by Mr Goldie, writer, Dumfries, who was M'Whir's agent, to do so: That, at the Commercial Inn, the officers supped with the jury, and Neilson took the head of the table: That, before supper, Neilson went with one of the officers, about nine or ten o'clock, to the inn of Joseph Pagan, innkeeper, Maxwelltown, to see his horse fed; upon which occasion Pagan remarked to the jurymen, that, as he had never been there accompanied by a livery servant, he should give them a treat; to which the other answered, that he intended so: That Neilson and Pagan left the jurymen in the stable with the hostler and some other men: That the jurymen followed them in about ten minutes, and they had some whisky together in the bar, which was the subject of conversation; and, after spending about half an hour there, the jurymen and Neilson, having been about an hour at the Commercial Inn, returned there and supped with the officers, Neilson taking the head of the table, as above deposed to. One of the jury remarked it was a case they could not understand, and that they had nothing to do with it: That, after sup-well. keeper, observed to Neilson, that he seemed to take great interest in the case, and to be a partisan of M'Whir's; when Neilson answered, that it well became him, or that he had a good right, as M'Whir was his uncle.

 That, next morning, being Sunday, Neilson and the other officers breakfasted with the jury, when Neilson began to talk about the case, and said that M'Whir should gain it, or words to that effect: That this was said to the jury, or some of them, or in their presence and hearing: That Dickson checked Neilson, and said there should be no conversation on the subject:
 That, after breakfast, several of the jurymen went to church, and Dickson went along with them, but one or two of the jurymen remained at the inn, and Neilson remained with them: That, in the course of the Sunday the jury were in different parties with one or other of the officers, and Neilson had what opportunities he pleased to converse with them separately; Neilson and Dickson dined with the jury on Sunday, but Richardson did not, as the macer told the officers they should not be with the jurymen: That the free intercourse betwixt the jury and officers was noticed by others, and particularly by Lord Moncreiff's servant, who remarked that it was improper, and believes that this led to the macer's interference: That Neilson, in his whole conduct, betrayed a greater degree of interest in the case on behalf of M'Whir than was fitting for an officer having charge of or attending the jury: and the deponent verily believes that the said Robert Neilson did improperly hold intercourse with the jury on the subject of the cause, to the effect or with the tendency of influencing their verdict in favour of the defender M'Whir."

With reference to this deposition, Maxwell contended, that the interference with the jury on the part of Neilson was a sufficient ground for a new trial,<sup>1</sup> and that the facts deposed to could be proved by witnesses other than the jurymen, which took this case out of the rule of the case of Stewart v. Fraser.<sup>2</sup>

The Court, before answer, and without requiring any farther condescendence of the facts alleged, granted commission to examine witnesses "in relation to all matters connected with the inclosure of the jury at the trial of this cause at the time, and after the order pronounced by Lord Moncreiff on the 30th day of April last."

A proof was taken accordingly, and reported as concluded on the part of Maxwell; the Commissioner, at the same time, reporting the objections to two witnesses (one of whom was Neilson) adduced by M'Whir.

Aliment—Provision to Children.—Circumstances in which the Court awarded aliment at the rate of £60 per annum, on account of a child of 2½ years of age residing with its mother.

- 1 22, 1836. By antenuptial contract in 1832, Alexander Munnoch, soap-manufacturer and wholesale spirit merchant in Stirling, settled the interest of £2000, together with the liferent of his household furniture, upon his wife. This provision was in lieu of all her legal claims. He died in April, 1835, leaving one child, a boy then about one year old. He had made no settlement, but his estate amounted to above £12,000, and his brother was served tutor-at-law. A difference arose between the widow and him as to the amount of annual allowance which should be made to the widow on account of the child who lived with her. She raised an action of aliment, concluding for an allowance of £120. The defender stated that the deceased had always lived in the flat of a house, with no other establishment but two maid servants, and that he considered £40 the proper sum, especially in reference to the extreme youth of the child.
- 21 Division.

LORD PRESIDENT.—In fixing the aliment for this child, who is little more than two years of age, we should have it in view to adopt such a scale as may be suitable for several years to come; perhaps until the child shall be seven years old or so. The sum of £40 is decidedly too little, and probably, in all the circumstances, £60 might be the most suitable. But any extra expense, such as for medical attendance, &c., should be allowed in addition to this.

LORD MACKENZIE.—I am of the same opinion. We cannot give such an allowance on account of the child as would not only provide suitably for its maintenance, but also prove a source of profit to the mother, and raise the scale of the whole family. In all the circumstances, I approve of the aliment proposed by your Lordship.

A bill of suspension was passed, and a record was made of the suspenders alleged that the bill was signed by William Macdonald, one of the partners of Macdonald, Son, and Co., who had permitted the company firm to a private oil speculation of his own: that he was engaged along with William Richardson, the drawer of the bill; that it was known to Richardson that the company was in the speculation; that Richardson received the whole of the bill, and was bound, even in a question with William Macdonald, to have retired it; that he discounted it with Edward Railton, a partner in the Ship Bank of Glasgow; that the bill was noted for non-payment, but afterwards uplifted by Railton, in favour of Richardson; that Railton had some transactions both with Macdonald, and with Andrew Rowley, the Glasgow agent of Langton, and that he (Railton), at adjusting one of these transactions, gave his own indorsation on the above bill, and delivered it to Macdonald, still containing Richardson's blank indorsation, for the purpose of being handed over by Rowley to Richardson, but that, as Macdonald became insolvent, while indebted to Langton and Bicknell, he had fraudulently retained the bill as a means of obtaining satisfaction of Richardson's debt.

10. 88. The suspenders pleaded, that, as the bill did not pass into the hands of Rowley, until not only the term of payment was passed, but it was noted for dishonour, it could only be acquired by Rowley and the chargers, Langton and Bicknell under liability to every exception which was pleadable against Richardson; and that if it could be proved, either that Richardson knew the bill not to have been granted by William Macdonald for a company transaction, or that Richardson was not the proper creditor in the bill, but was himself bound to retire it, then the chargers could not enforce payment of the composition on that bill against the company and Macdonald, Son, and Company, and their cautioners.

Langton.

The Lord Ordinary, "in respect it is admitted that the bill in question was indorsed to Andrew Rowley, the agent for the chargers, not only after the term of payment was passed, but after the bill had been dishonoured and noted accordingly, found that the chargers are not entitled to the ordinary privileges of holders, but are exposed to the exceptions pleadable against the indorsers, and therefore allowed the suspenders a proof, by competent evidence, of their averments, that Richardson, the drawer, was the proper debtor in the bill, and that he knew that William M'Donald, in accepting the bill, used the company's firm for his private purposes, in a transaction in which the company had no concern, and also their averment that Rowley, the chargers' agent, improperly delivered the bill to the chargers for their behoof, when he ought to have given it up to Richardson, the drawer: and appointed the case to be enrolled, that the suspenders may state what is the nature of the proof they mean to adduce." *

In this interlocutor the chargers acquiesced. The suspenders then lodged a minute in reference to the nature of the proof, craving a diligence for recovering the correspondence between Richardson, William M'Donald, Rowley, and Railton, or either of them, touching the bill, &c., and excerpts from their books of all entries relating to that subject. The suspenders farther offered to prove their averments by the oaths of * * NOTE.—By the law of Scotland, the circumstance of a bill being indorsed after the term of payment, does not take away any of its ordinary privileges in the hands of the indorsee, and in this respect, our law differs, at least to a certain extent, from the law of England. But it appears to the Lord Ordinary that the case is altered if the bill has been dishonoured, and the dishonour marked by the notary on the face of the instrument. A party is then put upon his guard that an objection exists against its payment, into the nature of which he is bound to inquire. It does not follow from this, that a proof prout de jure should be admitted of all the acceptor's defences against payment. There is still written evidence against him, under his own hand, of the existence of the debt, which evidence can only be redargued habili modo. This is the view taken by Mr Bell, in his Commentaries, Vol. I. p. 403, and it seems to be sanctioned, if not by express decision, at least by the principles assumed in argument on the bench, in some of the cases to which he refers, particularly in that of M'Gowan, February 24, 1826. It must be admitted, however, that the case of Adam, June 19, 1830, has a contrary aspect, and the question, therefore, is not unattended with difficulty."

Richardson and Railton. The Lord Ordinary, "before farther answer," No. 88 granted a diligence for recovering the documentary evidence, "in so far as written previous to the raising of the action."

Dec. 23, 18
Macdonald
Langton.

Among the documentary evidence recovered, were two letters of Richardson in June and July, 1833, which was long subsequent to the period when Rowley became holder of the bill. These letters were addressed to Langton and Bicknell, when requesting them to accede, along with Richardson's other creditors, to a private composition, and in both of them he stated that Rowley their agent, had admitted, in presence of Railton, that he (Richardson) had informed Rowley he could give no right to Rowley over the bill for £283, 4s. 9d., as he (Richardson) had no right to it himself. Entries were also recovered from the books of the several parties, which afforded presumptions in support of the allegations made in Richardson's letters. And these were farther strengthened by the circumstance, that no claim on the bill had been lodged for the chargers in the sequestration of Macdonald, Son, and Co., though their agent, Rowley, had attended several meetings of the creditors, being himself a creditor on another account. And the bill in question was not given up by Macdonald, Son, and Co., among the debts due by them.

In these circumstances the Lord Ordinary "allowed the suspenders a proof prout de jure of their averments, that they were not debtors to Richardson in the bill in question; that Rowley was made aware of that fact, and that he unwarrantably indorsed the bill to the chargers, when it was his duty to have returned it to Richardson." *

The chargers reclaimed.

LORD BALGRAY.—I think the Lord Ordinary has put the cause on its right

* "NOTE.—It is settled by a final interlocutor, that the bill in question is not a privileged document in the hands of the chargers, and they hold it subject to the exceptions pleadable against Richardson. But it is not yet sufficiently proved that Richardson was not truly creditor in the bill, or that Rowley was not entitled to indorse it to them as a good document of debt, though, in consequence of the acceptor's bankruptcy, not of the same value it would otherwise have been. Richardson's letters, of a date subsequent to the indorsation, are all the direct evidence yet obtained on the subject, which, by themselves, are not conclusive. But they furnish at least a presumption to that effect, and there are other presumptions arising from the state of the books, both of the suspenders and chargers, and also of the books of Railton and Rowley, and these are strengthened by the circumstance, that neither Rowley nor the chargers claimed under the sequestration of the suspenders. It is asserted in Richardson's letter of the 29th June 1833, that Rowley admitted, in presence of Railton, that Richardson said he could give him no right in the bill, from its not being due by the suspenders. Railton and Rowley are both competent witnesses to the fact, and other parole evidence can perhaps be obtained. If it be proved that Rowley improperly indorsed away the bill, this will let Richardson's evidence with regard to its onerosity, for he will no longer be held to be deponing to the validity of the debt after the assignation. In short, the Lord Ordinary that there are sufficient grounds in this case to sustain by parole evidence, as has always been done, where there is no unfair dealing as to bills of exchange."

CHARLES RANKEN, Respondent.—H. J. Robertson.
ALEXANDER GOLDIE, (Curator bonis to Lord Stair), Compearer.—
R. Bell.

Trust—Possession.—Trustees under a settlement bought lands to be entailed, but delayed executing the entail, and, in the mean time, took the conveyances in their own favour; the party who, by the trust-deed, was made first heir of entail, entered into the natural possession of the lands, and, after some years, executed an onerous disposition and assignation for behoof of his creditors, and afterwards became insane; his disponee, in the meantime, had entered into possession; in a bill of suspension and interdict at the instance of the trustees against the disponee, the Court, in the circumstances, refused in the Bill-Chamber to prohibit him from ~~lifting~~ lifting the rents, but passed the bill, on caution, to try the question.

In January, 1835, the Earl of Stair executed a trust-conveyance of his whole heritable estates, and of his whole moveable estate in Scotland, in favour of Charles Ranken, solicitor in London, whom failing, certain other trustees to be named by his Lordship's creditors. The purposes of the trust, after paying expenses and public burdens, were declared to be to pay annuities, amounting to above £14,000 per annum, and chiefly consisting of premiums upon policies effected on the life of Lord Stair; and also to pay other debts existing at the date of the trust. Among the annuities, one of £1020 was due to Ranken. The trust-conveyance gave powers not merely to uplift rents, but also to cut timber, enter vassals, let leases, without grassums, and in general to execute every power competent to the granter of the trust, and consistent with the terms of the deeds of entail under which he had right to the lands. The trust-conveyance, besides other estates, included lands to the value of £170,000, which had been purchased by Sir John Hamilton Dalrymple and others, the trustees of the late Lord Stair, who died in 1821, under trust-directions to add them to the entailed estate of the family of Stair. The conveyance to Ranken specially included "all claims and demands of whatever nature and description" competent to Lord Stair against the trustees of the late Earl. The lands, which had been purchased by the trustees, were acquired at various times; and the trustees, in place of taking the titles directly in favour of the present Lord Stair, as first heir of entail, took the titles to themselves, and were still infeft in the estates, all of which were said to have been bought as early as 1827. The trustees stated that, in thus holding the estates they acted by the advice of counsel, in order to save expense, by finally including the whole of the lands which were to be purchased by them, in one deed of entail, by which means also the irritant and resolute clauses could be made more conveniently to affect each and every parcel of the estates. But as Lord Stair was the first heir of entail, and entitled, so soon as the trust was brought to a completion, to be infeft under the entail, and as his Lordship in the meantime had the corresponding beneficiary interest in the estates, he was put into the natural possession of them, and drew the rents by his own factor. This state of possession had continued for several years prior to the execution of the trust-deed in favour of Ranken. Under that deed Ranken took infeftment in July 1835, and subsequently uplifted rents. In May 1836, before the term of Whitsunday, Sir John H. Dalrymple and others, presented a bill of suspension and interdict, stating that Lord Stair had become insane; that they were feudally infeft in the estates above-mentioned, to the value of £170,000, which they had bought under the trust of the late Lord Stair; that they had a right to the natural possession, merely under an obligation to pay over the net rents to the present Lord Stair, but that his Lordship, as a matter of convenience, had been allowed them to enter into the natural possession of these lands and draw the rents; that this was done by their mere tolerance and permis-

 3, 1836. Lordship had no power to put a third party into possession without their 100 v. consent, and therefore that Ranken had no lawful title of possession; and " they prayed the Court to prohibit Ranken from interfering with the trust-estates, and "in the meantime to interdict the said Charles Ranken from uplifting, or attempting to uplift, any part of the rents, or any way to interfere in the management of the aforesaid estates standing vested in the complainers, as trustees of the late Earl of Stair, until the issue hereof." They offered caution if required.

Answers were ordered, and interdict was granted in the meantime, as craved.

Ranken answered that he had come under heavy advances to Lord Stair on the faith of the trust-conveyance; and that, whatever right his Lordship himself possessed in the trust-estates, was onerously transferred to him, and the present question must be decided precisely as if the bill of suspension had been directed against Lord Stair himself. For, although the disposition and infeftment by his Lordship to Ranken, could confer no real right until after his Lordship should be infeft, it was at least an onerous transference of every other right and interest competent to Lord Stair, especially as against the suspenders. If the suspenders had obeyed the trust-deed of the late Lord Stair, they would never have infeft themselves in the trust-estates, but would many years ago have infeft Lord Stair as first heir of entail, in which case his Lordship's own title of possession, and Ranken's title, derived from his Lordship, never could have been called in question. It was the fault of the suspenders that they had omitted this, and neither Lord Stair nor his onerous assignee should be placed in a worse situation thereby, at least in any question with the suspenders. And especially as this was a question in the Bill-Chamber, the actual state of possession should not be summarily inverted, and the interim interdict ought to be recalled.

The Lord Ordinary, "on caution, passed the bill, and continued the interdict at the instance of the suspenders." *

---

* "NOTE.—The Lord Ordinary does not proceed at all upon the alleged derangement of Lord Stair. But, according to the respondent's own statement, the suspenders stand infeft, as trustees, in the lands, while Lord Stair, under a disposition from whom Mr Ranken acts, has never been infeft, and has no title made up under which he could convey: Indeed, the facts, that the trustees have taken the titles to themselves, and have not enabled Lord Stair to get a title, form the very grievance complained of. Whether the trustees have been correct or incorrect in this, is not the question. The Lord Ordinary does not see how they could have avoided taking the titles to themselves in the first instance. But however this may be, or whether they ought, by this time, to have given the lands over under the entail to Lord Stair, the fact is, that they have not done so. If they be wrong, his Lordship's remedy resolves into a right to compel them to proceed correctly; but he was neither qualified nor warranted in ousting them, via facti, by a conveyance to vising the reclaiming note of Ranken, appearance was made for tor bonis of Lord Stair, who stated that he was not yet suffiinformed as to the facts of the case to identify himself with either rties.

PRESIDENT.—It was merely as a matter of convenience that the execu-tails of the lands which were bought by the suspenders, was allowed to
Had the trust been literally followed out, that would have been done is time, and Lord Stair would have been infeft as first heir of entail. It lt of his Lordship that this has not been done, and I think that, in every with the suspenders, both Lord Stair and his onerous assignee must be h as if the trust had been so far implemented. It would be unjust to r if he was not to be held as being in the same situation in which he re been, if the entail of these lands had been executed, and he was infeft ir of entail.

BALGRAY.—I am of the same opinion. Had the trust been followed out to its natural meaning, Lord Stair would have been long ago infeft as of entail in the estates bought by the trustees. I consider that Ranken, e onerous assignee of Lord Stair, is in the same position with his Lord-that the powers which he exercises in virtue of his Lordship's deed, must garded as powers exercised by his Lordship himself. He is just the hand Lord Stair acts, and if Lord Stair had a right to levy the rents and maestate, so has Ranken. At the same time, I apply these observations the power of uplifting the rents, and I think Ranken should beware, in cumstances, how he grants leases of the lands. At present the case is the Bill-Chamber, and I certainly am not prepared, de plano, to invert ng state of possession. It is clear that the expenses of managing the d paying the public burdens, must fall on Ranken if he levies the rents,

No. 90. and Lord Stair, or his onerous assignee (which is the same thing), I decidedly think they should be dealt with just as if Lord Stair was now infeft as first heir under the entail. It is a principle of equity and common sense in disposing of questions which arise out of trusts, especially between the trustees and the beneficiary under the trust, that, when any delay occurs without his fault, in carrying into effect the directions of the trustee, still the beneficiary must be dealt with as if the trust had been duly implemented. In this case, therefore, I look upon Ranken just as if he was the assignee of the first heir of entail in these estates. He holds an onerous assignation from the party who possesses the substantial right in the rents and administration of the estates. Against the suspenders he has a good right to found on Lord Stair's assignation to him, and it is no answer, on their part, to say that Lord Stair was never infeft, because it is through their fault alone that this has happened. I am far from imputing the smallest male fides to them, though I doubt whether the course they have adopted will save expense in the end. But whether it does so or not the embarrassing circumstances connected with the present question have arisen in consequence of their deviation from the directions of the trust in not sooner entailing these estates, and they are not to be permitted thereby to place Lord Stair, or his onerous assignee, in a worse position than if the entail had been executed.

LORD MACKENZIE concurred.

THE COURT recalled the interim interdict, and, quoad ultra, passed the bill on caution.

Dec. 23, 1836. THE late Sir Thomas Munro, Governor-General at Madras, was by birth a Scotsman, but spent the greater part of his life in India, and died resident there, in 1827. In 1819, whilst in London on a visit to this country, and on the eve of departure for India, he executed a last will and testament, in the English form, which was not so conceived as to be capable of conveying Scottish heritage.  Campbell v.
 Munro.

The will of Sir Thomas directed the residue of his whole estate, heritable and personal, after payment of legacies, to be invested in Scottish heritage, so far as this was not already done, and to be strictly entailed a series of heirs, of which his eldest son was first called. Under the element several questions arose, for the extrication of which the trustees raised a multipoleinding. In this process, the eldest son, now Sir Thomas Munro, and his curator ad litem, claimed a right to the whole heritage in Scotland, as heir-at-law, and also to take the benefit under the will of being first heir of entail, alleging that, by the terms of the will, he was not put to his election, but could take the whole Scottish heritage without repudiating or defeating any part of the will. He also contended that he was immediately entitled to the rents and produce of the whole estate, under burden of a suitable maintenance to his younger children, and that the trustees had no power to accumulate the income of the estate during his minority or for any other period.

The trustees maintained that, by the terms of the will, a distinct intention to include the whole Scottish heritage was expressed, and that, by the law of England, the will was so expressed as to put him to his election, so that he could not take benefit under the will, if he carried off the Scottish heritage as heir-at-law, thereby defeating the testator's intentions. They also contended that, after providing him a suitable maintenance, they were entitled, in reference to the terms of one provision in the will, to accumulate the surplus annual produce during his minority, and purchase lands to add to the entail.

Both parties referred to the law of England for the true import and effect of the deed; and a case was laid before English counsel, who gave opinion that the will was sufficiently expressed to put the heir to his election, and that he could not claim benefit under it, and at the same time defeat it by taking the Scottish heritage. They also were of opinion that the trustees had not power to make an accumulation of the annual produce, and that the heir was entitled to the whole income.

The cause was then reported to the Court on cases, and

1st DIVISION.

WHITE and OTHERS presented a summary application to the Sheriff of Edinburgh, against Mackersy, W.S., praying for the delivery of certain papers, &c. Mackersy, as a member of the College of Justice, declined the sheriff's jurisdiction, and presented a bill of advocation, in respect of his professional privilege. The bill was passed on answers; and before the letters were expedite, White and Others presented a written petition to the Inner-House, praying for a warrant to discuss the reasons summarily on the bill. They pleaded, that, as they were willing to dispense with the induciæ, and as the case was one requiring despatch, they were entitled, according to the old forms, to have the merits of the cause thus disposed of, and no change in this respect had been occasioned by the new forms of process. Mackersy answered that he was ready to proceed with every despatch under the expedite letters, but that the only regular course of procedure under the present forms was to expedite the letters and prepare a record in common form.

It was stated from the bar, during the discussion, that, in a recent case of a bill of suspension of a charge given by a presbytery, the Judges of the Second Division had held that, if both parties consented to discuss the reasons on the bill, it was a competent form of procedure.

LORDS GILLIES and MACKENZIE intimated, that they considered this to be a question in which the competency of the procedure could not depend on the consent of the parties.

After some incidental discussion, it was stated by the petitioners, that they were not inclined, in all the circumstances, to press their petition; and no deliverance of the Court was pronounced on it.

On the following day, the LORD PRESIDENT intimated, that the nature of the application had, on that morning, been laid by his Lordship before the Judges in the robing room, and that it was the opinion of their Lordships that the prayer of the petition could not have been granted, consistently with the existing forms of process, and especially in reference to the necessity of making up a record before disposing of the cause.

94. the rental to £384, 19s. There was expected to be a considerable increase of rental in about five years, on the termination of certain long leases. A factor loco tutoris was appointed to the eldest son, and the widow presented a petition for an award "of £300 per annum, for the support and aliment of herself, and for the maintenance and education of the minor heir and younger children." The factor lodged answers, stating that he concurred in having a suitable aliment awarded to the widow and the heir, but felt it to be his duty to resist an award of aliment to the minor children, in consequence of the law being now fixed that an heir of entail was not liable to such a burden; but that it was for the Court to consider whether, in awarding aliment to the widow and the heir, the existence of younger children could enter into their consideration. He also stated that, by the entail, the heir was prevented from imposing any burden on the lands except by way of locality to a widow, not exceeding one-fourth part of the free yearly rent of unlocated subjects.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The law is quite fixed that an heir of entail is not liable to aliment his younger brothers and sisters. The proper amount of aliment to be awarded is a question, which, to a considerable extent is discretionary, and, in the whole circumstances, I should think an award of £100 per annum, for the maintenance and education of the heir, and £150 per annum, for aliment to the widow, would be fair and reasonable during the pupilarity of the heir.

The other Judges concurred, and

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Grant warrant to and ordain the factor to make payment to the petitioner, for her eldest son, and till he is 14 years of age, of the yearly sum of £100, payable half-yearly at Martinmas and Whitsunday, beginning as on the 15th July, 1835; and to the petitioner, being as aliment till her eldest son is of the age foresaid, of the yearly sum of £150, payable half-yearly as aforesaid, and decern; and appoint the expense of this application to be paid out of the rents."

KING'S ADVOCATE, Pursuer.—Sol.-Gen. Cuninghame—Maitland.

LORD DUNGLAS and CAPTAIN R. CUNNINGHAM, Defenders.—

D. F. Hope—Anderson.

Title to Pursue—King's Advocate—Stat. 2 & 3 Will. IV. c. 112, and 3 & 4 Will. IV. c. 69—Process.—1. Under the statutes 2 & 3 Will. IV. c. 112, and 3 & 4 Will. IV. c. 69, the Commissioners of Woods and Forests have no title to pursue a reduction of a royal grant of an office of chamberlain and collector of the hereditary revenues of the Crown. 2. The Lord Advocate has no title, without a special warrant under the sign-manual, to institute an action regarding the patrimonial rights of the Crown. 3. Such action not validated by a royal warrant of ratification subsequently obtained. 4. Circumstances in which a preliminary defence of want of title in a reduction held not to be foreclosed, notwithstanding the satisfying of the production and pleading on the merits.

27, the management of the hereditary revenues of Scotland was transferred from the Barons of Exchequer to the Commissioners of Woods and Forests, it being provided that, from and after the act's coming into operation, "all honours, castles, manors, lands, tenements, and appurtenances, in Scotland, which now do, or hereafter shall appertain to the King's Majesty, his heirs," &c. &c. "and all and every the duties, and profits thereof, or of any of them," &c. &c. ; "and all the ways and means for recovering the same, or the possession thereof, and accounts relating thereto," &c. &c. "shall be under the management, control, and direction of the Commissioners, for the time being, of His Majesty's Woods, Forests, Land-Revenues, Works, and Buildings in England and Ireland, and their successors acting under, or by authority of, an act passed in the 10th year of the reign of his late Majesty George IV."

The following year an act was passed (3 and 4 Will. IV. c. 69), to amend and enlarge the powers of the Commissioners in regard to the revenues of Scotland. It was thereby enacted, that the Commissioners should have the same powers in regard to the land-revenue of Scotland as they possessed in regard to that of England, and in particular as contained in the provisions of the 10 Geo. IV. c. 50. It was also enacted that the passing of the act should not vacate the appointment of a chamberlain or collector, but that every such chamberlain or collector should continue in office "until his death or resignation, or until he should be removed by the Commissioners, for the time being, of His Majesty's Woods and Forests," &c., saving always the rights of "any person of the Crown, under an appointment lawfully made by his Majesty previously to the passing of this act." The act further contained the following clause (§ 22) :—"And be it farther enacted, that 1 95. Office, shall be deemed and held to be sufficient service on the said Commissioners, any law or practice to the contrary notwithstanding."

Advoc-Lord

In the year 1827, his late Majesty George IV. had granted to the defender, Lord Dunglas, for life, by commission under the seal used instead of the Great Seal, the office of chamberlain and collector of the rents, revenues, &c. of the lordship of Ettrick Forest, part of the hereditary estates pertaining to the Crown of Scotland, which rents, &c. amounted to only £235, 7s. 7d., with a salary to himself of £300 a-year and £20 a-year to a deputy, "out of the monies of the said collection, and wherein they come short, out of the first and readiest of the rents, revenues, and feu-farms, and other casualties of superiority, issuing and payable to the Crown, out of the lands and lordship of Dunbar, in Scotland, by the purchasers of the lands of Spott, and other lands within the sheriffdom of Haddington."

In 1834 a summons was raised for setting aside this grant as ultra vires of his late Majesty, together with a deputation granted by Lord Dunglas, and for repetition of the salaries, in which summons Lord Dunglas was called to answer "at the instance of the Right Honourable Francis Jeffrey, our advocate, for and in name and behalf of Us and of the Commissioners of our Woods, Forests, Land Revenues, Works, and Buildings, in terms of an act passed in the 3d and 4th years of our reign, c. 69, and acts therein recited, pursuers, to whose great hurt and prejudice, as acting for Us and the public in virtue of the said acts, the warrant, and grant, letters patent, or commission aftermentioned, were made, given, and granted."

As preliminary defences Lord Dunglas pleaded—

1. The pursuer prosecuting on behalf of the "Commissioners of the Woods, Forests, and Land Revenues," has no title to claim repetition of the salary paid to the defender, or his deputy, during the lifetime of his late Majesty King George IV. The salary was paid out of the hereditary revenue of his late Majesty, and the pursuer has no title to prosecute for or recover any payment of salary made prior to the accession of the present king.

2. All parties are not called. As the summons seeks to reduce the deputation granted by the defender, and likewise concludes for repetition of the salaries paid to his deputy, the deputy ought to have been made a party to the action.

The Lord Ordinary (25th June, 1834), pronounced an interlocutor reserving "consideration of the first preliminary defence on the want of title to pursue till the merits of the cause come to be disposed of," finding that all the proper parties were not called, and sisting till the deputy should be called by a supplementary action. A supplementary summons was thereafter raised against the defender, Captain Cunningham, the deputy, as well as Lord Dunglas, to which joint defences were given in;

and in the mean time there was lodged in process a warrant, sign manual, ratifying the institution of the action by the Lord on behalf of his Majesty, and authorizing his lordship to proceed to a final issue.

for the Defenders—

According to the true construction of the summons, the action is at the instance of the Lord Advocate for the Commissioners of the Woods and Forests, as acting on behalf of his Majesty in the management of the hereditary revenues, and not at the instance of his Lordship acting for himself.

The powers of the Commissioners are limited to the management of the woods and revenues, and the collection of the rents, &c.; but no authority was given them to pursue reduction of commissions or to sue by the sovereign prior to the surrender, and which are the objects of the statute transferring to them the management.

Considering that, under the terms of the summons, the Lord Advocate is held as pursuing on behalf of his Majesty, his Lordship has no authority ex officio, and without a special warrant under the sign-manual, to pursue an action regarding the patrimonial rights of the Crown, which are under the exclusive guardianship of the Officers of State.

A warrant of ratification cannot validate the instance; for although, if the instance is properly set forth, the want of authority at the date may be supplied by subsequent ratification, this can be of no use in the present case, where, without a special warrant, the Lord Advocate had no title to pursue; and,

The question of title is still open, having been reserved by the first plea of the Lord Ordinary, and kept up by the plea in law on the

u. 95. move every obstacle to their collecting these revenues, and to set aside all grants or rights interfering therewith, under the sole reservation contained in the act, of grants "lawfully made;" under which clause they undertake on the merits to establish that that here in question does not fall.

24. 1836
The Advocate
v. Lord
Glas.

3. The title of the Lord Advocate to appear for the King is general, and is not limited to matters criminal; and in practice he has long been in use to sue for his Majesty in civil questions.

4. The defect of a special warrant, if such is required, is fully cured by the warrant of ratification, in the same way as the want of a mandate from a party abroad, when an action is raised, is suppliable by a mandate of ratification subsequently obtained.<sup>1</sup>

5. The objection to the title is foreclosed. The preliminary defence reserved, regarded only the conclusion for repetition of the salary drawn in the reign of his late Majesty, and the plea now insisted in was not taken as a preliminary defence, but was incorrectly inserted in the defence on the merits, after the production was satisfied, and thereafter also incorrectly retained on the record; and besides it has only reference to the title of the Lord Advocate as suing for the Commissioners, but not to his Lordship's title as insisting for behoof of his Majesty.

LORD MEDWYN.—In considering the important and somewhat novel question brought before us in these papers, it is proper that we attend particularly to the character and object of the present action. It is not a simple process for recovery of any of the revenues of the Crown, brought against a vassal holding lands in Estrick Forest, nor a challenge of a grant made subsequent to the period when the management of the Crown property was vested in the Commissioners of Woods and Forests; but it is a process of reduction for setting aside a commission, granted many years ago by his late Majesty, upon the ground that it was ultra vires of the Sovereign to grant it. It is raised by "our Advocate for and in name and behoof of us, and of the Commissioners of our Woods, Forests, Land-Revenues, Woods and Buildings, in terms of an act passed in the 3d and 4th years of our reign, 1689, and acts therein recited."

The defenders plead against this action two defences,—on the title and on the merits.

The Lord Advocate protests against the right of the defender now to state a preliminary plea on the title,—that, according to every rule of our forms and pleadings, such a plea is now foreclosed; for though this plea was set forth in his defences, it was not insisted on by the defender at the proper time, and was abandoned or waived; and it is farther said, that it is now resorted to for a very obvious reason. I quite understand the nature of the proceedings in this case, this objection being well founded; for it appears, by the interlocutor of 25th Jan. 1834, that the first preliminary defence, on the want of title to pursue, was

, intended at these instances to be taken into consideration, and room for argument, and more serious than I first thought when the point finally pleaded to us. The Commissioners act "on behalf of his Majesty;"
form of the deeds in the schedule appended to the act which confers their import, and the instance is by the " Lord Advocate for US and the Commissioners, in terms of a certain act, pursuers." Now, at the very outset, there is a difficulty; when it is said " for us," is this in compliance with the form that the Commissioners act on behalf of his Majesty, or is it a separate instance? I am inclined to think, if it had been with a view to comply with the act, that the same could have been observed, and so as to make the Lord Advocate pursue for the Commissioners on behalf of us; but then does the word pursuers apply to the Commissioners solely, or to them and the King, as both pursuing? I rather think either view, it would have been as correct, if the Lord Advocate had raised the instance in his own name, in behalf of the Crown, as well as for the Commissioners, and being to prosecute for both, that he should have been stated simply as pursuer, like any mandatary for two parties. But the ambiguity as to who are the pursuers, seems cleared up, as the summons goes on to say, " to whose great hurt and prejudice, as acting for us and the public," the commission was granted. Now the instance is to the pursuers. This is clearly the Commissioners, for it is added, pursuers for us. The prejudice is not to the Lord Advocate, neither is it stated to the Crown directly; but to the pursuers as acting for the Crown, that is the Commissioners of Woods and Forests. The decerning clause, too, leads to the same conclusion, for it bears that the defender should make restitution and payment to the pursuers. Now, the Commissioners alone claim to receive these rents, for it is previously stated, that his Majesty had surrendered them: and this shows strongly, that as the term pursuers here applies to the Commissioners, so, where it is used at the commencement of the summons, the pursuers should apply to them also. It is, however, averred in the conclusion of the fourth reason of reduction, that we, and the said Commissioners, are right to collect and dispose of the hereditary revenue; and however in-

No. 95.

 King's Advocate v. Lord
 Douglas.

especially when the further conclusion is, that the said warrant is made in violation of our rights, and has the effect of diminishing our hereditary land-revenues, which implies that the Sovereign is interested in the action. Still, however, there is much difficulty even in this; for, besides that these latter expressions do not relate to the instance, but to the ground of action, they would have been correct if the instance had been by the Advocate on behalf of the Commissioners alone. In such a summons, it must be recollected, is a writ proceeding in the King's name, directed to Sheriffs in that part, to cite the defender to appear before the Lords of Session to have a commission set aside, as prejudicial to the rights of the Sovereign. This could only be described by the King speaking in his own person, and using the regal term, as our rights, just as the reference in the second reason of reduction to his late Majesty, styles him our Royal predecessor. It is with much hesitation, therefore, that I get over this objection; perhaps I ought not to do so, merely because the instance is not set forth in a clear precise manner, so that at least it is ambiguous; but I do not wish, in this case, to proceed on grounds which it is possible even to question as too critical; and, upon the whole, I incline so to interpret this summons, however awkwardly expressed, as to give the Lord Advocate the advantage of holding that he prosecutes for the King as well as the Commissioners.

Our next enquiry is, whether the Commissioners of the Woods and Forests, who may sue or be sued in name of the Lord Advocate, have a title to pursue the reduction of a grant by the Crown, on the ground of its being ultra vires of the Sovereign. The act 2d and 3d William IV. c. 112, may be just noticed in passing, to show that it is not overlooked. By it no powers were given beyond what were previously enjoyed by our Court of Exchequer, who clearly had no such power. The next act, 3d and 4th William IV. c. 69, passed on this subject, is specially referred to in the summons, and is mainly relied on by the Lord Advocate. It bears to have been passed to extend and enlarge the powers of the Commissioners, in relation to the management and disposition of the land-revenues of the Crown in Scotland, and the preamble following out this object declares, "that it would be expedient that the Commissioners should have the same powers of selling, leasing, and administering Crown property in Scotland, as they had in England," for which purpose the act 10th Geo. IV. c. 50, is extended to Scotland and made part of this act. But these regulations have reference merely to sales and leases of the property, and to the subsequent investment of the funds, and not the most distant allusion is made to the conferring any power to call in question, by reduction, any commission flowing from the Crown, or to institute any similar proceeding; and the pursuer can never be held, to come under a clause which empowers the Commissioners to remove any deputies, clerks, or receivers, &c.<sup>1</sup> These are officers acting under the Commissioners; and the concluding words of this very section show that they are officers that may be appointed by them, so that they are totally different, both in name and character, from the Chamberlain, who holds his office independent of the Commissioners, in virtue of a commission under the Great Seal of Scotland, issuing upon a warrant under the Sign-manual; and the necessity of such a process as the present shows, that the powers conferred by that clause do not meet such a case as that of the defend-to be removed by any simple order of the board for removing him ; but under which he holds his office must be first set aside in a court of law. the argument no better founded, which, alleging that the commission with their receiving the revenues of the Crown, the Commissioners are to remove it out of the way, in order to enable them to levy the rents of rest. This would be a very bold stretch of interpretation indeed. But it is provided for by enacting, " That the passing of this act shall not vacate the appointment of any chamberlain or collector ; but every such chamberlain or collector who shall be in office at the time of the passing of this act, shall continue in office until his death or resignation, or until he shall be removed by the Commissioners, or until his appointment shall cease under the provisions herein and referred to." The removal here mentioned can allude only to such officers as hold their offices at pleasure, and where the royal pleasure has been to the office, or to meet the case of any who may be removable by the Commissioners, if there be any such ; and this general expression (for it must be that there is no clause in this act similar to the clause in the 10th of Geo. removing deputies, clerks, &c., which expressly gives the power of removing chamberlains to the Commissioners), cannot possibly imply a right in the Commissioners, and give them title to reduce the appointment of a chamberlain for life, or to be removed till that is done ; and when the ground of reduction is, that the commission is illegal, as ultra vires of the Sovereign.

It is further said, that the saving clause only protects a grantee of the Crown, of any appointment lawfully made by his Majesty, and that the commission of the defender is not lawfully made. Be it so. But then, at whose instance is the lawfulness of this commission to be tried ? If not lawfully made, it may be set aside ; but the defender is entitled to have the question tried by a court duly authorized to challenge it on the only ground on which it can be, that it was ultra vires of his late Majesty, and is in violation of the authority of the present Sovereign. The statutes referred to have conferred no such power on the Commissioners of Woods and Forests.

It is also said, indeed, that if the Commissioners had found any person collecting rents without a title, or interfering with diligence used by them for their duties, they would have been fully authorized, by the powers conferred upon them by the acts referred to, to insist in name of the Lord Advocate, just as the officers of Excise or Customs formerly were. Nay, the officers of these departments are authorized to insist in all such actions for recovery of duties ; therefore it is idle, in support of either the one instance or the other, to refer to such cases as Wingate against Robertson against Jardine. The defender, being a Chamberlain, may sue any of the Crown vassals of Ettrick Forest for their rents or feu-duties ; see case of Sir Henry Munro, 20th June, and the Commissioners might probably be heard in a declarator, that they were the persons entitled to collect these rents, similar to the Commissioners of Customs. Lord Dundas, 25th May, 1810, as to the custody of wrecks in Orkney. The action would attain their object ; but they would immediately be removed by the commission from the Crown, which can only be got out of

King's Advocate
v. Lord
Langdale.

It is just as idle to refer to the Commissioners of annexed estates purporting approbation of a subvaluation of tenns; case against Sir R. Menzies, 1773. It might fall under powers of management to lessen the burden on the rents; but would it have been competent for them to object to and reduce a grant of tenn by a former Sovereign to an heritor, as ultra vires of the Crown, and against the prerogative of the present Sovereign? That case clearly imports no such right.

The statutes under which the Commissioners act might have expressly conferred upon them power to set aside the commission; and this would have been a good title in them, without interfering with or diminishing the inherent right of the Crown to challenge it; then either might have been pursuer, or both might have joined sue. But there is no express power given,—that is unquestioned; and it is only inferred by implication, that with the power of management which has been taken from the Crown and vested in the Commissioners, this right or privilege has been transferred also. If this be so, it rests no longer in the Crown, as little as the management and levying of the rents do. But the Lord Advocate has produced a warrant from the Crown on which he founds as a title. He must hold, of course, that the power of challenge is still in the Crown, if this authorizes it, and then it cannot have been transferred to the Commissioners. It might have been created and bestowed upon them by statute, without impairing the right of the Crown but it cannot be transferred along with the powers of management without diminishing the Crown. It cannot be in both—in the original holder of the right, and the party to whom it has been transferred at the same time, otherwise than by a creation of the right in favour of the latter. So that the warrant seems to give the deathblow to the title of the Commissioners.

Under the powers then conferred upon the Commissioners by the acts, I am of opinion that they cannot pursue any process for setting aside a commission granted by the Sovereign, as ultra vires of the Crown, and as being contrary to the prerogative of the reigning Monarch; and therefore, that the instance, so far as it proceeds in the name of those Commissioners, cannot be maintained.

Let us now enquire into the other branch of the instance, in so far as it may be supposed that the Lord Advocate pursued this action, “for and in name and behalf of his Majesty.”

But before entering upon this important enquiry, embracing a point of some curiosity in our practice, as a subject of constitutional law, I must first advert to the production of the warrant, dated 6th February, 1836, ratifying and confirming the proceedings in this process; and consider whether this is sufficient to obviate the objection to the action having been raised by the Lord Advocate, for and in name and behalf of the King, supposing that instance objectionable. For if this will cure the defect, it will be unnecessary to enquire into the objection, as to the instance in the suit as originally brought into Court.

That such a warrant, granted previous to the institution of the reduction, would have been sufficient authority to raise it in the name of the Lord Advocate, there can be no doubt; and it is argued that it should validate the proceedings which took place previously, as was held in the recent case of Wylie against Adam, 5th February, 1836, where the objection that an action had been raised in name of a person out of the country, and without his knowledge or authority, was obviated by production of a mandate from him. But there the action was brought in name of title, at present assuming that matter?

Be quite aware that there are many instances in which the Court has allowed a title to be made up and produced cum processu, or the want of a link in a title to be supplied. But this is always where the pursuer has truly the right, and the action is properly instituted in his name, though there may be some formal defect in the title, which is necessary to complete his title. But where a pursuer brings an action, having neither the right nor title to do so, it is quite a different matter. Whether it will be sufficient that the proper party afterwards comes forward to regularize the proceedings. They were originally invalid, and I think the rule actio vitiosa applies to such a case; so that "a title supervenient after a summons, is not sufficient for pursuing thereof." This has been a rule of practice from the earliest times; and two cases are reported by Balfour, p. 15, to this effect, in 1541; and being a rule of essential justice, it has continued to be observed down to the present day, amidst all the manifold changes in the law of process. Thus, on this ground, a comprising was found null, because the assignment to the debt was subsequent to the date of the charge to enter heir. 15th November, 1666.<sup>1</sup>

A decree upon an assignation dated after the summons was granted, was not valid, though the cedent concurred, the pursuit not being at his instance. 15th November, 1666.<sup>2</sup>

A decree of redemption of a wadset was not sustained, because, before making order of redemption, the pursuer had not been served heir to the reverser. 15th November, 1666.<sup>2</sup> But against Lord Macdonald, 19th January, 1672; being, as I suppose, a decree of provision, and not having the general character of heir.<sup>3</sup>

A decree by an adjudger against a superior, will not validate a summons of redemption on that title, prior to it. Dundas, 10th November, 1683.<sup>4</sup> But a decree subsequently taken infestment on a charter of adjudication, this was valid, because he had a title; but it was imperfect and incomplete, which is stated.  s. 24, 1826.
 ag's Advo-
 v. Lord
 nglas.

A similar judgment was given in Dunbar, 30th July, 1714. And very recently, a charge having been given by a married woman on a bill payable to herself, a suspension was raised on the ground that it should have been at the instance also of her husband. The husband sisted himself as a party to the proceedings in the Bill-Chamber, the answers to the bill being in his name also, and it was pleaded that this obviated the objection. But the Court held otherwise, and suspended the letters. Jeffrey against Matheson, 28th June, 1826 (S. & D).

Now, these decisions proceed on this principle, that although a party having the right by a general title as heir or executor, may complete the right and process, and validate a prior action raised on that title, yet a singular title, such as an assignation or adjudication, is not to be dealt with in the same manner; and still less therefore, can it be pretended, where the pursuer has not the semblance of a title where he has no right in himself, and is not authorized by the party having the right, that his unauthorized proceedings in his own name as pursuer, challenging the right of another who is in possession, will be validated upon any subsequent ratification by the true party. The proceedings are null, as not being at the instance of the proper party, but in name of one not authorized to institute them or carry them on. And when the true party appears, he must just proceed by a maintenance of his own instance, or with the instance duly authorized by him; and he cannot, except with the consent of the defender, adopt the prior null proceedings by any ratification of them. It would be contrary to the most ordinary rules of judicial procedure, to allow a pursuer such a mode of curing a blunder on the instance which brings a process into Court. The first thing a party has to consider, before he commences any judicial proceeding, is to consider whether he has the proper title in his person duly completed to do so.

Entertaining the opinion then, that the production of the warrant will not support the instance by the Lord Advocate for the Crown, if it was previously bad, I have now to consider this point, and whether it was competent for the Lord Advocate, virtute officii, to institute the process of reduction in his own name, and without a special warrant to that effect.

The commission of the present Lord Advocate is admitted to be in general terms, granting no special powers, but that it follows the style used since the accession of Geo. I., merely bestowing the office, referring therefore to the course of practice for its powers, duties, and privileges. Whether the terms used in the commission to Sir David Dalrymple, in 1709, were intended to give more ample powers than usual, and whether even they would imply a special authority to institute any action in name and on behalf of the Sovereign, which a special mandate might warrant, I shall not say. It is enough that such are not the terms of the present commission, which bestows no special powers whatever, and I am entitled to assume that the commission of the preceding Lord Advocate, by whom this action was instituted, was in the same terms; which makes it necessary to ascertain, from the history of the office, and of the practice where he is pursuer in the civil Court of processes on behalf of the Crown, whether the instance of the Lord Advocate for the Sovereign be sustainable in the present process. Your Lordship will not be surprised that there is not much authority from our writers on law to refer to; for it is well known that Lord Stair, our greatest systematic writer on aims any thing against the Crown, he applies by a petition of right, on right, for permission to do so. The King grants this permission, and a writ is issued for trying the question with the King. This was settled in the reign of Edward I.<sup>1</sup>

In this matter is now different, for the King does not pursue in his own right as it was otherwise at an early period.

Chief notices in our law that I am acquainted with, as to a prosecution process on behalf of the Crown, are these:—The King pursues Henry of Carnabe, as to the wardship of the lands of Granton, 16th October, 1478; the King prosecutes the persons of inquest for lands, as held blench, instead of ward, of the Crown.<sup>2</sup> The King against Mowbray and others, 17th June, 1487, is an action brought in virtue of a writ for buying goods of a prize belonging to a nation at amity with us, and redemption.<sup>3</sup> The King most frequently appears as pursuer in his own reductions of services and retours, when erroneous and against his interest. The King against the Sheriff of Fife, 2d April, 1492; Balf. p. 247. The King against the Sheriff of Air, 13th February, 1495; ibid. The King against the Sheriff of Perth, 15th January, 1532; ibid. 433. The King against Laird of 26th March, 1541; ibid. 291. This is stated in a case in 1541, “as on use and consuetude in sic cases.”<sup>4</sup>

Actions, however, came to be prosecuted sometimes at the instance of the King, when against the persons of inquest as temere jurantes super assisam. The King against Lyne, 2d March, 1542, and other cases under that title.<sup>5</sup> Officially authorized to prosecute, this must have been as prosecutor for this was a public crime, and punished as such, with confiscation of goods, imprisonment, and infamy.

As against burghs for dilapidating their common good, the King at this time appears in person as pursuer, to redress the wrongs done by the Magistrates or their officers. The King against the Burgh of Aberdeen, ult. Febru-

o. 95. have been departed from about the middle of the 16th century, probably in imitation of the practice of the courts of France; for we find the Queen prosecuting by her Advocate, the Laird of Wemyss, 1st March, 1546.<sup>1</sup> The Laird of Cockburn v. Lord Ross, 10th May, 1557. Lord Ross, 26th February, 1561; Balf. p. 426, c. 80 and 29 some of these being against persons of inquest.

I know of no instance in which the Sovereign is called as a defender in a process. On the contrary, in an old case, reported by Kerse,<sup>2</sup> the date of which is not given, it is said that, "in all matters where the King has interest, albeit his officers be not called, yet if the party be perceived to collude to the King's prejudice, the King's Advocate may cause call the cause, and get the King admitted for his interest." It is not said that he was to assist himself for the King's interest. And the King's Advocate had full means of hearing of every such process in Court; for at this time, however anomalous it may now appear, he was always one of the Judges of the Court of Session. Sir George Mackenzie mentions,<sup>3</sup> that in France the King's Advocates were at the same time Judges; "and this was so decided by the Parliament of Paris in June, 1605; and from this we probably, in Scotland, took occasion, a little after that time, to make Sir William Oliphant and of late Sir John Nisbet, both Advocates and Lords of Session." Mackenzie however, is mistaken as to this, for the practice is much earlier, and dates back to the original institution of the present Court in 1582.

Among the original fifteen ordinary Judges of this Court was Sir Adam Outburne, who was King's Advocate from 1525 to 1538.<sup>4</sup> He was also Provost of Edinburgh from 1524 to 1535; and in his commission as a Lord of Session, he is so designed.

He was succeeded as King's Advocate by Henry Lauder of St Germain's, in 1538, who became one of the Lords of Session in 1540.<sup>5</sup> He held this office till 1561, along with his office of King's Advocate, in which he was succeeded in 1558 by John Spens of Condrie.

Spens was, in 1561, appointed a Lord of Session,<sup>6</sup> and both these offices he held till his death in 1573.

Robert Creichton of Ellick was appointed joint-advocate with Spens in 1560, and he also was raised to the bench in 1581.<sup>7</sup>

On Spens' death in 1573, David Borthwick of Lochill was appointed joint-advocate with Creichton, and at the same time a Judge in the room of Spens, and retained both situations till his death in 1581.<sup>8</sup>

Creichton died in 1582, and was succeeded both as King's Advocate, and on the Bench, by David McGill.<sup>9</sup>

It is unnecessary to pursue this further, except to notice that in later times, besides the instances mentioned by Mackenzie, it appears that the President, Sir George Lockhart, was ordered, by a letter from King James VII., to officiate as advocate in the Parliament 1686.<sup>10</sup> A Judge pleading before the Court would be thought singular now; but Sir George Gilmour, when President, pleaded for his son-in-law, having been declined as a judge on account of relationship.<sup>11</sup>

We find that it was not peculiar to the office of King's Advocate, for the Sovereign to sue in his name. Thus the Queen and her comptroller pursue for wrongous intromission with rents of lands excaused by James V. 28th May, 1557.<sup>1</sup> Here the Queen's Advocate appears only as counsel for the pursuers. Although the Advocate pursues, in name of our Sovereign Lady, reduction of a decree by certain cardinals, depute by the Pope, in a case with the Provost of St Geilles, if this was in the Advocate's name, the proceedings show that the Lord Governor authorized them, 1546.<sup>2</sup>

Dunglas.

It thus appears that the Sovereign now did not prosecute in his own name alone, and thus early we see the way paved for the person of the Sovereign, either as pursuer or defender in a civil process, being represented by the Officers of State.

The King's advocate was authorized to act as public prosecutor of crimes in the time of James VI. This is implied in 1579, c. 78, and still more expressly by 1587, c. 77, which authorized the Thesaurer and Advocate to pursue, although the private party did not. He may have had power previously from the Sovereign to prosecute in the pleas of the Crown; but in that large class of crimes, then prosecuted at the instance of the private party, his power was confirmed and fully recognised by these statutes; so that, since the date of the latter act, his right to prosecute all crimes has been unquestioned. For after the passing of the first of these, and prior to the date of the other, this Court had refused to sustain his instance in the crimen falsi, where the private party did not also concur. King's Advocate against Chapman, June, 1583. King's Advocate against Forrest, March, 1584.<sup>3</sup> But immediately after this his title is sustained in such a case; Chalmers against Dick, Spottiswood, p. 166. Thirlestane against Durham, February, 1597,<sup>4</sup> and it has not been disputed since.

The Thesaurer's interest to pursue was on account of the single escheat, which fell to the Crown on the outlawry or conviction of a felon. The King's Advocate is first marked in the record of the Justiciary Court, as Lord Advocate, in 1598, in the trial of Arnot of Woodmiln.<sup>5</sup>

His being prosecutor in all crimes, is the origin of his right to pursue, in contravention of lawburrows, which supposes a breach of the peace, and where the penalty is divided between the King and private party.<sup>6</sup>

Also that he must concur in actions of improbation, because if the writ be improved as false, the party may be punished for forgery.<sup>7</sup>

He also prosecutes for usury, a power specially given by 1597, c. 247.

These are processes before the Civil Court.

It appears also, that when the King had made a gift of the ward marriage, &c. of any of his vassals, when the donator instituted a general declarator, besides using his own name, it was also at the instance of the Advocate for his Majesty's interest. This was to support the gift; and the subscription of the King at the gift was equivalent to a mandate to do so, if there was no special warrant in each case.<sup>8</sup>

No. 95. In like manner, a summons of general declaration of single combat is at the instance of the donator and King's Advocate.<sup>1</sup>

But a summons of special declaration, after the gift is declared in general, is at the instance of the donator alone.<sup>2</sup> And still, more, to show that the King's Advocate pursued (only to support) the gift, and it may be, in virtue of it, when a general declaration is brought up, the gift, made not by the King, but by a Lord of regality, he does not pursue it, unless with the donator. Accordingly there are many instances of such instances: And King's Advocate and Donator against Lewis, 19th December, 1672; Stair, King's Advocate against Fairlie, 1st February, 1678. King's Advocate against Yeats, 25th and 28th July, 1680. A gift of recognition was also, at one time pursued by the King's Advocate and the Donator, December, 1591, the Earl of Cassilis; afterwards by the donator alone, Marston, 15th December, 1669; Lord Halyton, 29th July, 1672. When a gift had been made, it is not the Advocate alone who pursues, as in the case against Lord Colville for the annulment of his marriage, but the Lord Treasurer and the Lord Advocate jointly, 20th February, 1667; Stair.

Further, there is the style of one summons, in Dallas, p. 289, a summons of declaration at the King's Advocate's instance, which is raised in his name, for the interest, and thereby having for one use and behoof sufficient, good, and undoubted right and interest to prosecute the action of declaration and distinction, as specified. Now, admitting that, in the case of a feudal delinquency, such a declaration, it had come into practice, that the King's Advocate could prosecute, in delinquencies against the state or lieges, without a special warrant, this would be far from supporting his right to pursue in his own name in other cases; where there was no approach to delinquency against the Crown, and where no usage had sanctioned it. It may be noticed, that Dallas mentions that in such a summons the Lord High Treasurer, and Treasurer-Depute, as well as the King's Advocate, may be jointly pursuers; in other words, that it may be raised at the instance of the Officers of State.

Except the above, I really do not know of any one civil question in which the Lord Advocate was at any time authorized to prosecute in his own name, on behalf of his Majesty, without a special mandate; indeed, as to the general declaration on gifts from the Crown, it is doubtful if a special warrant was not issued, as will appear from a case afterwards to be noticed; but were this otherwise, when we consider how few of these process now are pursued, for all those following on feudal delinquencies are abolished, or in disuse, and a service is no longer challenged by a proceeding against the assize, we may see how few are the processes which the Lord Advocate can now institute in his own name.

There is a letter of the King, dated 15th August, 1632,<sup>3</sup> authorizing the Advocate to pursue a redaction where teinds are undervalued; and the Commission of 1641 expressly gives this power,<sup>4</sup> so that it is quite clear he had it notwithstanding. Further, it may be noticed that there is a letter from the King in 1634 to the Commissioners, directing that there shall be no valuation of teinds until the Treasurer, or Treasurer-Depute, is heard for the King's interest in regard to his often expressly lays down the law thus, that "the King's Advocate is upon the King's interest for one party against another without a special mandate." This was so decided in Earl of Southesk, 20th January, 1680—a renounced in presence of the Duke of Albany, when the Court would not incline to abridge the privileges of the Sovereign or his Advocate. It, it was expressly found that he "cannot prosecute any action at the instance, tending to challenge the right of any of his Majesty's subjects, without a special mandate to that effect." Lord Advocate against Moncrieff, 2d 1693.

In Marshall's report of this case, it is mentioned that the law is so laid down and therefore when Dallas, as referred to by the Lord Advocate, who is Styles in 1697, mentions, that "there be summons of reduction, immediate declarator, at the King's Advocate, his instance, and sometimes of reversals, for his Majesty's interest, against subjects," as he does not say that in these cases is without a special mandate, it must be implied, as of this judgment such actions were specially authorized according to recognised law. For that this was quite recognised law, appears further from two following cases, not hitherto noticed on either side. The King's and Fowars of Scoone pursue a declarator against Lord Stormont as to exact certain services in their charters from the Abbey of Scoone. It is in defence, No process at the King's Advocate's instance, for he cannot sue of the King's vassals without a special mandate and warrant from his Majesty. The answer is, It is only in reduction and improbation that the Lord needs a special warrant. The majority of the Court held that the King's Advocate cannot insist alone, and refused process till the instance by the Fowars was sustained by production of their rights, 28th January, 1697.<sup>3</sup> Indeed, it is not a good title to pursue, without any aid from the Crown, whose interest does not well appear; but the defender does not venture to dispute that in a reduction a special mandate is required.

No. 95. part, this action. The answer is, the King's Advocate is empowered to pursue cases by a commission from the Lords of Treasury, which is equivalent to a date from the King. The defence was repelled, 28th December, 1698.<sup>1</sup> King's Advocate v. Lord Dalrymple, even where there was a donor pursuing, the King's Advocate did not appear, he had any right to join in the suit, virtute officii. So that it may be decided whether the Stylus in Dallas, already alluded to, warranted any inference that there was no special warrant in addition to the gift. Further, at a more recent period, while it was found that the nightingale declarator of boundaries, in protecting the rights of the Crown from encroachments, it was held that, in reductions of grants from the Crown, the Lord Advocate must produce a special warrant; Earl of Breadalbane against Mackenzie, July, 1785. In fact, in this case, he was properly supporting the grant of the Crown in favour of Lord Breadalbane.

But it is said that instances are to be found of reductions supported at the instance of the Lord Advocate alone, without any special warrant and in his office; and reference is made to the case of the reduction of the grant to Morton of Orkney and Shetland, 29th February, 1660;<sup>2</sup> and at the pleadings, reference was also made to Lord Advocate against Rankin, 15th February, 1660, the reduction of a decree of the Admiralty. There, it will be observed, as prior in date to the above cases, and therefore could not now be quoted as authority. But truly, this last was rather an unfortunate reference; for all the title of the report simply mentions the Advocate as pursuer, on reading the decision, it will be seen that it had been objected, that neither the Officers of State (observe, the Officers of State), nor the Commissioners of Prizes, he called in the process before the Admiral, and a special application had been made to the King, and he had granted express warrant to his Advocate to insist on the reduction: so adverse is this to the pursuer's plea. And I cannot but think that a similar authority, or a warrant from the Privy Council, had been given in the other case also; which, although it passed in absence, was too important a proceeding not to have been conducted by Sir John Nisbet, then King's Advocate, with all due formality. The decree, which was at the instance of his Majesty's Advocate for his Majesty's interest, was ratified in Parliament by the act c. 19, which again annexed Orkney and Shetland to the Crown.<sup>3</sup> I am therefore inclined to believe, that if the records of the Privy Council were searched, the process examined, such authority would be found, as in that reign it was so the custom, even in prosecutions for crimes, where the Advocate's power to prosecute was undoubted, to have a warrant from the Privy Council, or from the King's own hand.<sup>4</sup>

Indeed, it must not be held that in those cases in the Reports, where the Advocate is alone mentioned as the pursuer, which indeed are not many, mention is made of his warrant, as, for instance, King's Advocate against Nithsdale, 25th February, 1679, and King's Advocate against Heriot, 12th November, 1684, and 19th February, 1686;<sup>4</sup> that therefore there was none. For in the important case of the Earl of Lauderdale officers of the Mint, 19th January, 1683,<sup>1</sup> in which the parties were found in solidum for the sum of £72,000 sterling, the pursuer is stated to be his Majesty's Advocate. He is also pursuer in a question against the creditors of the Duke of Argyle, 29th January, 1684; and if the reports on these dates alone are considered, it might be argued that he insisted in these processes virtute officii for the Crown; but by a notice on 7th November, 1682, it will appear, that he is fully authorized to prosecute the first action before the Court of Session; and proceedings in the other are by special commission to the Court, and warrant from the King; see notices on 1st March, 7th April, and 24th September, 1683. However, in the recent cases of Lord Advocate against Lord Dundas, 17th May, 1836, and Lord Advocate against Lord Mansfield, same day (which are strangely enough referred to as supporting the instance in the present case), the summonses expressly bear to be at the instance of "our Advocate for our interest, in virtue of a mandate under our royal sign-manual to that effect." Yet no notice is taken of this in the reports. It is so also in the recent case of Robertson of Tullibelton. In the case in the Dictionary, the Relist of Murray, 18th February, 1502, is said to be against the King's Advocate. Adverting to the history of the office, I was surprised at this; but on looking into Balfour's Practicks, p. 237, from which this opinion is taken, it appears that this is a mistake; the defender is the King's Advocate.

King's Advocate v. Lord Dundas.

The King's Advocate, from his office, was of course, employed in conducting processes in which the King was concerned; and the circumstance of his being Judge also in the Civil Court, where of course he could not judge in the King's cases, will not appear so anomalous, when it is recollected that criminal causes were the province of another Court; and the Parliament and Privy Council also composed of many causes now belonging to the Supreme Civil Court.

The Lord Advocate adverts to the circumstance, that the King's Advocate was one of the Officers of State. He was, and is so; though he was not a very high officer, nor one of the earliest, nor had any peculiar powers as such. Little aid can be derived from this circumstance, in support of the title to pursue the present action, because it is not as an Officer of State, but as King's Advocate, that he insists.

The first appearance of the Officers of State as a separate and recognised body of the state, so far as I am aware of, is in the Parliament 1st October, 1487, in the time of James III.,<sup>2</sup> but the Advocate is not among them, although the King had then such an officer, as he appears previously in a process against John Ellem Butterden and others in 1479.<sup>3</sup> It is stated in a report about the precedence of these officers, given into Parliament, that the Clerk-Register is mentioned in the Rolls of Parliament as an Officer of State in 1482.<sup>4</sup> The King's Advocate (John A. Otterburne) is mentioned as one of the Commissioners, with the powers of Parliament in 1525. He was then a Member of Parliament as Commissioner for Edinburgh, of which he was also Provost.<sup>5</sup> But he is not among the Officers of State, not yet having attained that dignity. He, however, is a member of the Privy Council in March, 1525-6.<sup>6</sup>

No. 96. State, and he is placed at the bottom of the list, seems to be in 1540,<sup>1</sup> which he was only an officer of the Crown, not yet raised to the rank of King's Advocate of State, or with its important duties and privileges. His salary in 1562 was £40 Scots,<sup>2</sup> and it is remarkable that the Advocate for the poor, a most peculiar and at that time, I believe, peculiar feature in our jurisprudence, had a half that sum paid by the Crown in 1557.<sup>3</sup> Nor was the deficiency of King's Advocate made up by his emoluments as a judge, for I do not know that time the judges had any salary. Their predecessors, the Lords of the Bench, were expressly required to bear their own costs; and the better to do this, to have the King's unlaw of the Court, which is £40, divided between the Clerk-Register, 1451, c. 63. Nothing is said as to salary at the institution of the present Court; and by 1579, c. 93, the King declares he will not put an ordinary judge any one who, among other qualifications for the office, "efficiently living of his awin." The act 1587, c. 43, ordains as the pains of the players, that the party against whom decree is given shall pay to the Advocate "twelve pennies of every punde" recovered before them, to be levied in any way, as the 40 shillings of ilk, decrees of before, which seems to have been only emolument previously.

If the office of King's Advocate was not very amply remunerated in the 16th century, it would appear that the King's Advocate was sometimes, in the exercise of his office, called upon to do what we should now reckon not very becoming of a State officer; for it appears that the summons of treason against James Crichton, Master Henry Lauder, Advocate to our Sovereign Lord, and three of the common people, without designations; and Lauder is actually examined on oath, along with the other witnesses before Parliament, to verify the execution of the messenger. He is not even employed where we might have expected would be; for my Lord Secretary and the Clerk of Register present a letter to the King to the Lords of the Articles in 1540, about an excambion betwixt the Abbey of Dunfermline and the Crown.<sup>4</sup>

The Officers of State, I have said, are first entered in the Rolls of Parliament in 1487, and in the next Parliament 1487—8, they are enumerated under the term clerici.<sup>5</sup> They are again termed clerici in the Parliament 3d Febr. 1489—90. But this title is dropped in 1491, and does not seem again applied to them.<sup>6</sup>

They seem first to be mentioned as officarii in the Parliament, 16th Febr. 1567, the first after Queen Mary returned to Scotland, and in which she was in person, where the Lords of the Articles are set down una cum officariis then follow six officers, the last of which is the Advocate.<sup>7</sup>

Again, at the Treasurer's instance a case is advocated, and a compromise is charged, because the defender was fugitive for treason;<sup>3</sup> the consequence of which was, that his single escheat fell to the Crown, and was under the charge of the Treasurer.

Nay, so late as 1685, the Duke of Queensberry, as constable and captain of the Castle of Edinburgh, brings a reduction against the heritors and possessors of the King's stables, alleging they were annexed property, as part and pertinent of the castle.<sup>8</sup> 11th March, 1685, Fountainhall.

The act 1600, c. 14, distinctly recognises the practice of the King's officers pursuing and defending the King's causes, and provides against their negligence in doing so. According to the pursuer's argument this act should have been applicable to the King's Advocate alone.

Perhaps your Lordships will pardon me, if I occupy a few moments in pursuing this historical detail as to the Officers of State.

The Officers of State were members of Parliament in virtue of their offices, and also voted with the Lords of the Articles.<sup>9</sup> We may presume they were always members of the Secret or Privy Council, and in fact they formed what was equivalent to the Cabinet Ministers of the Scottish monarch. Hence the act 1585, c. 13, which in the general case, abolished the practice of summoning a person to answer super inquirendis, has this exception, unless the letters be subscribed by at least four of the chief Officers of State, the Chancellor, Treasurer, or Secretary, being always one. It may be noticed, that the Advocate is not mentioned here, but this probably because he was prosecutor of State crimes.

The Officers of State had an appropriate place in the Scottish Parliament.<sup>1</sup> They sat on a bench one step lower, and immediately next in front of the Throne, the Chancellor sitting in the middle, and the rest on either side of him (next to them in front, and only one step lower, sat the Lords of Session); and as the Officers of State voted both with the Lords of the Articles and in Parliament, their influence in favour of the Crown was of course great, and some jealousy seems to have occurred on this head, so that James VI. in 1617,<sup>2</sup> agreed that more than eight should never vote with the Articles, or in Parliament; and it was one of the prerogatives of the Crown which Charles I. was obliged, in 1641, to surrender;<sup>3</sup> so that the right of nominating them, as well as the Lords of Session and members of the Privy Council, was conferred on the Estates of Parliament; at least the nomination was to be with their advice, and it was to be ad vitam aut culpam. In 1649 this right of nomination was assumed by the Estates alone.<sup>4</sup> This was rescinded at the Restoration, and the Royal prerogative again restored, when the Officers of State came to be distinguished into the great and the lesser, and in the latter class was the Lord Advocate.<sup>5</sup> Considering the manner in which the Lords of the Articles were chosen, and the addition to the influence of the Crown, by the Officers of State voting along with them, there probably never had been occasion for the Sovereign to claim a veto upon any of their resolutions; and accordingly it does not seem to have been ascertained that he had any such privilege. It was admitted that he had a negative in Parliament, although Fountainhall says this is not very ancient with us.<sup>6</sup>

By 1690, c. 3, the Officers of State might be nominated to be present with committees of Parliament, but they were only to propose and debate, but not to vote. They continued, however, to vote as Members of Parliament. But to turn from this digression.

The custom which we have seen of summoning those Officers of State, whose departments of duty would be affected by the proceedings, might easily have paved the way for the practice of summoning the whole Officers of State to represent the Crown, in questions in the Civil Court, and will also account for their appearance on behalf of the Crown as pursuers. But perhaps the practice may be traced to the letter of the King, or at least it was riveted by the publication of this letter to the Privy Council, 13th December, 1683, by which he commissioned his seven great Ministers of State to manage the affairs in Scotland:<sup>7</sup>—The Chancellor, High Treasurer, Justice-General, Privy Seal, Treasurer-Depute, Clerk-Register, King's Advocate, and the Secretary, if in Scotland; thus leaving out the Justice-Clerk, the only Officer of State omitted, and putting the Justice-General in his place. They called themselves the Secret Committee. Fountainhall says, "They were sent to the articles to the Parliament, to be a preparatory Committee to the Privy Council, to mould, form, and prepare matters, so that the rest of the Councillors will have little more to do save to ratify their conclusions. There is nothing to be proposed in Council, and no account of affairs or recommendations to be transmitted to the King, but by them."

Considering the importance thus conferred on the Officers of State in the management of public affairs, it was extremely natural that they should come to be held as representing the Sovereign, being those to whom any claim by a subject upon the Sovereign was to be addressed, and whose opinion would most probably lead to its admission or rejection, so that instead of the Officer, in his peculiar department, being called as defender, or setting himself forth as pursuer on behalf of the Crown, as formerly, the Officers of State appeared as pursuers or defenders; and accordingly we find that this form, unknown before, has been invariably observed, at least from a period soon after the date of the above letter, and uniformly ever since, in all cases where the Crown is defender, and in most cases also where the Crown is pursuer. Thus the mutual declarators as to relief from a sub-ent of the Excise of Fife, on account of a supervenient law, is at the instance of the Officers of State, Crawford, 1st July, 1696, Fount. In a process of valuation of teinds in 1699, the Officers of State along with others, were called as defenders. Council, vol. i. p. 426. The Earl of Morton, in 1701, raised a reduction of the forfeiture which carried off Orkney and Shetland from his family, and directed it against the Officers of State.<sup>1</sup>

In a competition between the donator of the late Earl of Dunfermline's furniture and the creditors, not the Lord Advocate, but the Officers of State, appear to support the gift. 8th December, 1702, Fountainhall.

The change which had taken place in the offices of Treasurer and Comptroller on the institution of the Scottish Court of Exchequer, and the still further changes, which occurred in consequence of the Union, and the transfer of the Government to London, riveted this practice. And although the abolition of the Privy Council of Scotland, and of such offices as Chancellor and Secretary, may have extended the political importance of the office of Lord Advocate as an officer under the Crown, it certainly has not increased his legal powers as Advocate for the Crown, nor made him the representative of the Crown, either as pursuer or defender of its rights or property in the civil court. This he must be content to share with the other Officers of State, and as included among them. If virtus officii, the Lord Advocate was entitled to pursue in his own name, in support of the civil rights and prerogatives of the Crown, it would be equally competent for the subject to call him into the field as defender, to support those rights. But he never is so; the action has always been brought against the Officers of State.

In addition to the old cases already noticed, I may mention, that in valuation of teinds it has been uniformly so. See cases in Fol. Dict. vol. iv, p. 89. In like manner, when the Crown is pursuer, the action is always at the instance of the Officers of State, except in the three recent cases of patronage already alluded to, which were raised under a special mandate and authority, narrated as the title to insist, and in one other instance I am now to advert to.

In 1794, a declarator was raised at the instance of the Lord Advocate for his Majesty's interest against M'Kenzie of Cromantee, relative to the patronage of no less than thirteen churches. It was disposed of in this Court, 19th May, 1808, and in the House of Lords, 28th June, 1814. The case is not reported; but in looking into the appeal cases, and seeing nothing said as to any warrant or authority in which the Lord Advocate proceeded, I thought it possible that here there might have been a deviation and exception from the general rule, but thought it of little consequence, except as showing that on one occasion a Lord Advocate had thought himself entitled virtute officii to institute such an action; for it appeared that Mr Mackenzie, instead of objecting to want of title, had immediately raised a counter-action against the Officers of State, bringing them into the field. However, upon ending to examine the original steps of process, I found that a warrant under the sign-manual was produced along with the summons. The Lord Advocate probably preferred raising so serious an action as this, and where the result showed that the attempted reduction must have been reckoned very doubtful at the least, by instituting it in a form which required production of a mandate from the Sovereign, rather than simply libelling a summons at the instance of the Officers of State, which implied no higher responsibility than his own. This is the first example I have seen of this form, and it probably was what led to the more recent case. In every other instance where the Crown is to pursue, the action has always been in name of the Officers of State.

Thus to begin even with patronage. The question as to the patronage of Clunie was decided in favour of Gordon of Clunie, 13th November, 1821, was at the instance of the Officers of State. The process with Lord Haddington relative to his rights over the King's Park, was at their instance, 24th June, 1823. They presented a bill of suspension to the right of a creditor, to point in the Palace of Holyroodhouse. Lord Haddington and Officers of State v. Laing, 14th November, 1821. King's Advocate
v. Lord
Stirling.

I may here just remind your Lordships, so as not to omit any case that I am acquainted with, though perhaps not perfectly analogous, of the appearance of the Lord Advocate for his Majesty's interest, in the English divorce cases in 1814. There was no contradictor in those cases, and the jurisdiction of the Scottish Consistorial Court had been sustained. The Lord Advocate claimed to be heard on behalf of the King, as entitled to restrain one of the Courts from extending its jurisdiction, and as guardian of the public, to prevent an improper assumption of power, in pronouncing judgments which would be illegal, and which therefore could not be recognised by other countries as the judgments of a court of competent jurisdiction. The instance, however, was not sustained, and the appearance of the Lord Advocate dismissed. The petition was presented in the case of Gordon or Pye v. Pye, and it is dated 1st July, 1814.

I have now brought this tedious enquiry to an end, and I think I am fully warranted in stating the result of this examination to be, that when it was laid down by the Court in 1693, that the Lord Advocate cannot prosecute any action at the King's instance tending to challenge the right of any of his Majesty's subjects without a special mandate, this was merely declaratory of the law, and that the practice since has been quite uniform, and without a single exception; so that the Lord Advocate has not, during the last century and a half, raised any such process in his own name as pursuing for the Crown, except when authorized by statute or by the Sign-manual.

Indeed, the practice is so uniform to raise civil processes at the instance of the Crown, either in name of the Officers of State, or of the Lord Advocate as specially authorized on behalf of his Majesty, that seeing the different course that has been adopted in this case, as well as in the recent cases against M'Lean, 12th January, 1836, and against Campbell, 5th March, 1836, and in particular, advert- ing to the result of the latter case, where the instance, as an instance for the Crown, was not maintained, but it was argued as being solely at the instance of the Commissioners of Woods and Forests, and now of the Lords of the Treasury in their room,—I am almost tempted to hold the statement of the defender well founded, that it was not intended, in the present case, to libel an instance for the Crown separate from that for the Commissioners of the Woods and Forests, although it has been since thought expedient to found upon the ambiguous mode in which the title is set forth to take the benefit of the right of the Crown also. For nothing could have been more easy, if so intended, than to set forth the instance of the Lord Advocate as pursuer, in name, and in behalf of his Majesty, in virtue of a special warrant; and also for the Commissioners of Woods and Forests, in virtue of the acts referred to; and concluding that the commission should be set aside at the instance of the Crown; and being so set aside, that then the defender should make payment of the bygone rents, improperly levied by him, to the Commissioners of Woods and Forests entitled to levy the same. But no such course has been followed.

re your Lordships proceed to the further advising of this cause, I am to correct an inaccuracy into which I have fallen relative to one of the referred to yesterday—the appearance of the Lord Advocate in the divorces ish marriages in 1814. The case is not reported, and I learn from Lord vbank that I was mistaken in thinking the instance was dismissed by the -it was withdrawn by the Lord Advocate, on the ground that a contradic- now appeared in some of the cases, so that the necessity of his appearance iated. Thus, at least, his appearance was not sustained by the Court. I d, yesterday, the case was not analogous, even if it had been otherwise.

o JUSTICE-CLERK.—I have no hesitation in stating fully the grounds of ion which I have formed in this case. It appeared to me, after the dis- which took place, that we had two points presented for our decision,—one to the validity of the title of the pursuers to insist in this action; and the lative to the merits of the action itself. I was a good deal surprised to see strongly disputed in the case for the pursuers; and I was led anxiously to the course of proceedings, and I came to be decidedly of the same on this point as that expressed by Lord Medwyn. I think it, however, ry to state shortly the grounds of that opinion. Your Lordships will ob- hat this action was followed by preliminary defences; and, upon the 25th , 1834, Lord Jeffrey pronounced an interlocutor in these words :—“ Hav- d parties’ procurators upon the libel, and preliminary defences, reserves ration of the first preliminary defence, on the want of title to pursue, till its of the cause come to be disposed of: Finds, that all parties are not and that the second preliminary defence is well founded; but in respect pursuer has, at the bar, intimated his willingness to call the defender’s in a supplementary action, sists process till the third sederunt day in No- next, in order that such action may be raised and brought into Court.” jection was cured by a supplementary summons. The interlocutor, as your pleas in law on both sides expressly refer to these objections to the title. The case was ordered to be argued, and again it came before your Lordships in cases, where the same discussion took place as to the title; and I see on the papers which I hold in my hand, an observation which I made to this effect, that it is an important and difficult question, both on the title and merits, and is a proper subject for a hearing. We ordered a hearing accordingly, and we had the whole point of the title fully discussed, as well as the question on the merits; and your Lordships, on the 9th of July, 1835, ordered mutual cases, in consequence of a note from the pursuers; and in these cases the whole question is before you. It does not appear to me that this objection to the title has been in any way disposed of. No judgment has been given upon it; but an express reservation is made till the case comes forward on the merits, and it remains now as the necessary preliminary point which your Lordships have to decide and dispose of in the first instance.

In considering the objection in regard to the title, your Lordships are aware in what shape it is presented to us. It originally was merely that the pursuers, holding them to be the Commissioners of Woods, Forests, Land-Revenues, Works, and Buildings, had no title to pursue. But the Lord Advocate stated that the defenders were in a mistake in holding it to be merely a summons in name of the Commissioners of Woods and Forests, because he was proceeding both for them and for his Majesty's individual interest. This was met by a full discussion; and it was not till after the close of the record, on the 23d February 1836, that the mandate or special warrant was produced. This is the shape in which the case is presented to your Lordships.

The first point then is, whether there is, under the summons which is now before your Lordships, a double or a single instance? Are there two parties joining in pursuing this action, or is there only one before you? On this point of the case as I humbly differ in some respects from Lord Medwyn, I think it necessary to state the grounds on which I do so. After anxious consideration of the case I have come to the opinion, that there is before you a summons at the instance only of the Commissioners of Woods and Forests. It is necessary for your Lordships to pay particular attention to the structure of the summons. It bears to be at the instance of the Right Honourable Francis Jeffrey, who was then Lord Advocate. Now it does, with great submission, appear to me, that this specification of the way and manner in which the summons sets out, is just that which is adopted to bring a challenge for and on behalf of these Commissioners; because your Lordships will observe, and the schedules to the act demonstrate, that in all their actions and proceedings, the Commissioners are said to act on behalf of his Majesty—like a board of revenue, but acting on behalf of his Majesty, and as the act of Parliament says, "They shall sue and be sued by his Majesty's Advocate." If the words that are here used, "at the instance of our Advocate, for and in name on behalf of US, and of the Commissioners of our Woods, Forests, Land-Revenues, Works, and Buildings," be correct and appropriate language,—if this is the proper way in which parties are brought into the field as pursuers, it is material to observe, that the reference made on the fourth line to these special acts of Parliament, shows distinctly, that as the persons so described refer to them as the warrant and authority, it is just a declaration that the instance raised in the summons before you is for these commissioners alone. One thing is clear, that according to the established rules applicable to all summonses, there is complained of is to the prejudice of these Commissioners themselves, as being under the statute. Then the concluding part of the summons is as com- appropriate, for the words, "we and the said Commissioners," are syno- nymous with us and said Commissioners. And is this not plain and distinct also, as to conclusions as to payment, which can only be made to the Commissioners, and the persons entitled to collect and receive money? The conclusion is, that payment shall be made to the said pursuers. Upon a critical examination of the instrument,—and one necessary and imperative on the Court to enter into,—I am decidedly of opinion that this summons neither bears upon its face, nor does it purport to be that summons which it is now held to be by the argument in the case of the pursuers. It is clear, that, if within the four corners of the summons there was meant to be agitated the question as to an invasion of the Royal prerogative or an undue exercise of it, by an act ultra vires of the Sovereign, there have been adopted, in various parts, words, to show that there were separate and distinct interests meant to be concluded for. I apprehend that there is a circumstance, however, that removes all doubts on the subject. It is a case which your Lordships will recollect was decided in February last, in regard to the reduction of the trust-settlement of a person of the name of Mure Campbell. The case was brought before the Court by a summons of reduction of his trust-settlement: I have it in my hand, and I beg to say that, although no doubt the case was raised on the right of his Majesty as ultimus hæres, but as falling, as was decided, under the department of Woods and Forests, it will be found, that the nature of this summons is the same as that now before your Lordships. It is the summons of "the Right Honourable John Archibald Murray, our advocate, for the purpose of the reduction, for, and in name and behalf of us," &c. An objection was brought forward at the instance and calling of the summons; and your Lordships know how it was disposed of in Court. But I wish to call your attention to a minute given by the part of the Lord Advocate; that minute sets forth in the close of it, the most important,—it states, that, in consequence of the change introduced by an Act of Parliament "It therefore became necessary to assist the said Commis-

stance before us in the name of his Majesty, which is a thing we never would do in any instance. This is the clear opinion expressed by the counsel for the Crown in reference to a summons, identical in language with the present; and it is quite impossible for me to put a different construction on the present summons. There is complete proof that that was the nature of the summons then before you; I do not think that the summons now before you bears to be, or professes to be, or is intended to be, any thing but a summons bearing the title to pursue to be, as supposed to exist, in these Commissioners of Woods and Forests.

In regard to the case which is now before us, I do not think it necessary, in tracing the history of the hereditary revenues of Scotland, to go further back than the statutes that were passed in the reigns of the last two Sovereigns and his present Majesty. I am fully satisfied that it is unnecessary to refer to the acts in the reigns of George I. and George II. as the whole of the Scottish hereditary land-revenues were completely reserved to all the Sovereigns of the House of Brunswick, and they were in the full right of the whole of them, down to the period of surrender made by his present Majesty. The Legislature had provided, that the land-revenues of the Sovereign, in England and Ireland, should be disposed of in different ways, and they were completely surrendered by George III,—but there were most special and pointed reservations of the rights of the Sovereign to the hereditary revenues of Scotland, which were left to be enjoyed by his Majesty, according to the constitutional law of the land as vested in him for the purposes contemplated in the statutes. By the act 1st of William IV. your Lordships know that his Majesty did surrender the whole of those rights quoad Scotland. I should here mention, that the only limitation that, in any of these acts, I can observe, in regard to the rights possessed by George III. and George IV. is in that statute of the 59th George III., and which is so far a limitation in their enjoyment. It is there declared, that with regard to the power to grant pensions, each pension shall not exceed £300 a-year; and that the total amount shall not exceed £25,000; and this the only limitation that I can discover in those acts.

The Scottish revenues were surrendered by the 1st William IV. ch. 25; but then it was a conditional surrender, "saving always to all and every person and persons, bodies politic and corporate, their heirs and successors, executors, administrators, and assigns, all such GRANTS, gifts of mortification, RIGHTS, titles, estates, customs, interests, CLAIMS and DEMANDS WHATSOEVER of, in, to, or out of the revenues, hereditaments, and others BELONGING TO HIS LATE MAJESTY KING GEORGE THE FOURTH IN SCOTLAND, as they or any of them had, or ought to have had, at the making of this act, as fully and effectually, to all interests and purposes, as if this act had never been made, any thing herein contained to the contrary notwithstanding." Here then was a complete reservation of all rights, grants, mortifications, &c., that had been granted by his Majesty George IV., no doubt subject to the general rules of law, but showing that the Legislature contemplated the existence of a variety of grants and rights of that description. That your Lordships are aware that this was followed by the act of 2d and 3d William IV., which gave the management to these Commissioners of Woods and Forests, it having been previously vested in the Barons of Exchequer in Scotland. This act gave power to take it from the Barons of Exchequer, and to give it to these Commissioners, with exactly the same powers. I would ask, at the time when by law the Court of Exchequer had the entire management, control, and direction of those funds, under the authority of his Majesty's advisers, would have been possible,—or would your Lordships have listened to an attempt on the part of the Barons, or the Lord Advocate in their name, to bring forward such an action as that which is now brought forward? I am speaking always in reference to grants that had passed under the Great Seal, and not speaking of subordinate rights at all.

King's Ad
cate v. Lo
Dunglas.

Then followed the act of 3d and 4th William IV. ch. 69. Unquestionably there are here important clauses in regard to this question; and first, your Lordships will observe, that it is an act “to extend and enlarge the powers of the Commissioners of his Majesty’s Woods, Forests, Land-Revenues, Works and Buildings, in relation to the management and disposition of the land-revenue of the Crown in Scotland.” Your Lordships will find that it professes to give the very same powers and authority which they had by law, in regard to the Crown revenues of England and Ireland. The preamble, after reciting several former statutes, sets forth, “That it is expedient that the said Commissioners should have the same powers in Scotland as is, by an act passed in the 10th year of the reign of his late Majesty King George IV. provided with respect to the land-revenues in England.” So that here, as the powers of those Commissioners had been defined by the 10th of George IV., that act declares, that every thing therein contained, as to their powers, should be held as to be extended to them in regard to Scotland. There is contained in it this important clause, “in payment and discharge of any annual sum or sums of money, or any pensions already lawfully charged, or to be charged thereon, respectively, and in the payment of any other principal sum, and the interest of any principal sum or sums of money already, or which may hereafter be lawfully charged upon the said lands and other property and subjects, and subject to the applications aforesaid, the said annual income shall, during the life of his present Majesty, be carried to and made part of the Consolidated Fund of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland; and from and after the demise of his present Majesty (whom God long preserve), shall be payable, and paid to his Majesty, his heirs and successors.” Then your Lordships recollect that the 18th section has an express proviso, “That the passing of this act shall not vacate the appointment of any chamberlain or collector of the revenues and profits of any of his Majesty’s lands, or other property or subjects to which this act relates; or vacate, render void or voidable any security given by or for such chamberlain or collector, but every chamberlain or collector who shall be in office at the time of the passing of this act, shall continue in office until his death or resignation, or until he shall be removed by the Commissioners for the time being, of his Majesty’s Woods, Forests, Land-Revenues, Works and Buildings, or until his appointment shall cease, under provisions herein contained or referred to.” So that, while it gives the whole management of these funds to the Commissioners, there is an express reservation of all existing rights and grants and a reservation that the passing of the act shall not have the effect of removing persons that are therein mentioned. As this act expressly refers to the 10th of William IV. c. 50, we are under the necessity of looking at the provisions of that act; and the 12th section has this proviso, that the Commissioners shall, from time to time, have the power to remove “any deputies, clerks, receivers, surveyors, or persons already appointed to, or exercising or enjoying any offices connected with the said possessions and land-revenues of the Crown to which the said act relates, who shall be hereafter appointed under the provisions of this act.” According to the phraseology of this section, unquestionably it confers

1836. powers; but they are powers, in my apprehension, limited to officers of an inferior description. Your Lordships see that the words are, "deputies, clerks, receivers, surveyors, or other officers;" and when you come to look to the power of appointment, and find it co-extensive with that of removal, I hold that description of officers to be officers of a lower grade. We know that there are high and important officers in England and in Ireland, and there does not appear the slightest glance of any power to remove such higher officers, particularly such as keepers and rangers. The last clause of this statute, accordingly, is an important one, for it provides that nothing contained in it "shall extend, or be construed to extend to abridge or interfere with any rights of his Majesty, his heirs or successors, or of the Lord High Treasurer, or of the Commissioners of his Majesty's Treasury, or the Chancellor of the Exchequer for the time being, or any grantees of the Crown, in respect of any appointment usually made by his Majesty, or the said Lord High Treasurer or Commissioners, or the Chancellor of the Exchequer, or such grantees, or with the right of appointment of master keepers, under keepers, or other officers of or in any Royal Forest, so long as such last mentioned right shall be vested in any warder or ranger of any such forest, or with any privileges or advantages which may be rightfully enjoyed or claimed under any letters patent granted by his Majesty, or his predecessors, of any office, bailiwick, walk, or lodge, within any of the Royal forests to which this act relates." Now this act being that which confers those powers on the Commissioners, in addition to the explanations given in the 3d and 4th of William IV., and when we see in it a clause which reserves all these higher rights, such as those of keepers and rangers, and such rights as are established and conferred by letters-patent: and when we see as complete and clear a distinction in regard to the extent of the powers of removing on the one hand, and appointing on the other, it does not appear to me to be possible, by any construction I can apply to this clause, to find that there is any power in these Commissioners to try the validity, or to contest the right of any office or grant held by letters-patent, or under a commission passing under the Great Seal. It is quite clear, however it may be spoken of, that this is a question which involves the exercise of the Royal prerogative;—it is a question to try the validity of one of the highest rights that can be exercised; therefore, as I have not been able to discover any power whatever which is directly given, it is impossible that we can imply such a power, contrary to all principles of constitutional law. A right to bring such a challenge must be conferred by the express words of the Legislature, before any one party can avail himself of such right; and I can discover no authority whatever for the Commissioners bringing these rights into challenge. I therefore agree with Lord Medwyn, that there is a complete answer to that part of the 18th section, which has been founded on, as to the continuance in office of any chamberlain and collector, "until he shall be removed by the Commissioners," as being applicable only to the powers and duty of the Commissioners, after the right to the office has been declared void by the competent authority, under a valid power to challenge it.

If your Lordships are of opinion, that there is a double instance, it only remains to see, whether his Majesty's Advocate is entitled to insist on the conclusion of this action. I am, however, free to say, that I do not find the slightest difficulty in arriving at the conclusion, that the late production of the warrant, under the sign-manual, can have no effect in this question. This was a good or bad instance before that production, which was posterior to the order for the first to attempt to enlarge on the force of those observations, because I am according to all the authorities we have, and according to the whole stream of opinions, as far as they have been discovered, that there does not appear to be fault in the Lord Advocate virtute officii to insist in any such reduction as is sent. It may be difficult to ascertain what were the principles of originally obliging the Officers of State to appear as pursuers or defenders for the interests of the Crown; but, as has been hinted at, they were, from their constitution, nearly his Majesty's constitutional advisers to a certain extent, for the treasurer, clerk-depute, and secretaries, were always in the list of Officers of State, and when they appeared, it was impossible to entertain a doubt that they were entitled to sue and defend the interests of the Crown; and the way in which the Lord Advocate afterwards proceeded with the assistance of the sign-manual, was just what there the Court was entitled to hold on the face of that instrument, that he was in direct communication with his Majesty's advisers, as it must be counter-signed by the Secretary of State; and, therefore, nothing more was required as his duty. But in the decisions referred to, we have the clear indication of what was the opinion of the Court was, as to the right of the Advocate, to appear without the sanction of the sign-manual. In the case of Moncrieff, in 1693, for instance, it is of importance to attend to how the report proceeds:—"The King's Advocate debated against Moncrieff of Reidy's right of presenting one of the matters of Session, mentioned 11th January last, was decided, the Chancellor being present;"—(Here there was no attempt to do any thing behind the backs of the parties interested for the Crown)—"wherein the Lords, by several votes, found the following points:—1mo, That John Adam, the private party's right being now settled, and transacted, that the King's Advocate could not insist for the King's interest, without a special warrant from his Majesty; there being only two cases in which he could quarrel the subjects' right, either by giving his concurrence to act against one subject against another, or when he had a mandate from the King to do so; otherwise he might vex all the lieges with processes, and open their chests." I beg to say, that the subsequent part of the report is important,

95. when his Majesty's interest is involved. I agree therefore with Lord Medwyn, who has discovered that in 1794—a case calling in question the right of the family of Cromarty, to 18 or 19 patronages—there was a special mandate under the sign-manual, where the challenge was brought ten years after the restoration of that estate. We have a whole train of cases in which signs-manual are produced, and are embodied in the summonses; and I am therefore clearly of opinion that, without a special mandate, in writ, the Lord Advocate has no right whatever per se to prosecute in regard to any reduction where the King's interest is supposed to be involved. It is the most important of all challenges to reduce a grant made by a prior Sovereign to a subject, on the ground of being ultra vires; and I think that the very circumstance of the attempt made to cure that defect in the present case, is just another testimony to the fact, that when such a challenge is persisted in, this is the course the Lord Advocate is to adopt. Even supposing a double instance here, which I think cannot be found, I am of opinion that the Lord Advocate has no more title than the other pursuers had. I abstain from saying any thing as to the merits. When we have a proper pursuer before us, we must proceed in deciding the case according to the rules of law.

LORD MEADOWSBANK.—The grounds on which the judgment to be pronounced must rest, have been so fully explained and thoroughly exhausted by Lord Medwyn and your Lordship, that I feel it to be extremely irksome to occupy the time of the Court by giving a detailed opinion upon the case. But as it is set forth in the additional paper for his Majesty's Advocate, that the present is a suit raised in consequence of an address to the Crown from one of the Houses of Parliament, and as it has been pleaded by the parties, with no ordinary anxiety and talent, I deem it incumbent upon me to give such an indication of the grounds of my judgment as to exhibit, at least generally, the views I have taken of the argument upon both sides, and to point out where, although arriving at the same conclusion with both your Lordships, there may be a shade of difference between us, upon some of the matters submitted for our consideration. The time, however, which has been already occupied by the deliberations of the Court, renders it imperative upon me to abridge, to the utmost of my power, the notes which are lying before me; and I am sure that, after what has been already stated, the parties can have no reason to regret that I at least should refrain from taking an extended view of the argument, or of the matters which it has been our duty to consider. Indeed, were I to go at much length into the case, I should just have to repeat what has been already gone over, and that in a manner much less satisfactory and more imperfect than that with which the subject has already been so admirably presented to their attention.

Without preface, therefore, I shall proceed to state, in the first place, that I entirely concur with both of your Lordships who have spoken, in being of opinion, that the charge preferred against the defender by his Majesty's Advocate, of having, at this stage of the proceedings, maintained his preliminary defence against the title of the pursuers, merely from a desire of obtaining delay upon frivolous, vexatious, and incompetent grounds, is utterly and entirely unfounded. This branch of the case was specially and most properly reserved by the Lord Ordinary for subsequent determination; and considering the view which I have taken of the case, I must have deemed the advisers of the defender both negligent and culpable if they had refrained from bringing this subject fully before your Lordships.

Having no doubt, then (and upon the same grounds as those explain ny Lords, had I considered the instance here set forth as that of two pur-viz. first, his Majesty's Advocate acting for his Majesty's interest ; and se-of his Majesty's Advocate, acting in behalf of his Majesty and the Comers of Woods and Forests, I should have had very great difficulty in g with your Lordship and Lord Medwyn, as to the necessity of his Ma-Advocate having previously obtained a special warrant under the royal annual, in order to have bestowed upon his Lordship power and authority to stituted this action in his Majesty's behalf. In other words, I should have eat doubt of our power in that case to have dismissed the present action, in as it was at the instance of his Majesty's Advocate for his Majesty's intepon the ground that the same had been raised in virtue of the powers con-upon him by his patent of appointment, and not upon a special warrant y issuing from the royal authority ; and to this subject for consideration, I dvert in the first place.

v, although it is necessary that I should explain, at least generally, the reapon which this doubt is founded, it is far from my intention to trouble your hips with any historical discussion as to the nature and powers originally in-in the office of his Majesty's Advocate, or to go over that great array of ities so ably, clearly, and elaborately detailed in the judgment delivered day, to all of which I have paid the utmost attention, but which have not e effect of entirely obviating the difficulties which I have found to be op-to my arriving at the same conclusion upon this point with your Lordship ord Medwyn. In short, I cannot find authority for laying it down, that the

No 95. which was not the case with others of the Officers of State. Accordingly they are expressly enumerated in the different commissions of council, which the Advocate is not, although he is mentioned as having been present at all the sederunts. From remote antiquity, therefore, he was virtute officii a confidential and responsible adviser of the Sovereign. In that respect the office was entirely different from that of the Attorney-General in England, who always has been only a law-officer of the Crown, and whose advice, before it can be followed by the King (and for which no responsibility whatever attaches to the Attorney-General himself), must be adopted and acted upon by one of Majesty's confidential servants, who himself is responsible for having made it the ground of his advice to the Sovereign; whereas the Lord Advocate was not merely the law-officer of the Crown, but the King's adviser, and counsellor in all matters in which the advice of the confidential servants of the Crown was required to be given; but more especially in those acts of the Government more immediately connected with his own department; and in this respect he seems to have stood precisely in the same situation as the Lord Treasurer or Comptroller. No doubt, his rank, with relation to the other Officers of State, as mentioned by Lord Medwyn, seems to have varied at different times; but the exact state of the precedency which this officer enjoyed, can, with great deference, afford little light as to the extent of his powers. Indeed, I think there is reason for supposing, that the rank was in some degree dependent upon that of the individuals holding at the time the other appointments of the Officers of State. Thus, if one enjoying high hereditary rank in the country held the office of Lord Treasurer, or Comptroller, or Lord-Register, he of course would be made to precede the Lord Advocate, who ranked after the dignities which they enjoyed personally, independent of their official appointments. In that order, too, their names would be entered upon the rolls of Parliament, and hence, down to a comparatively recent period, when the rank of the Lord Advocate was settled to be higher than that of the Lord Justice-Clerk, his position will be found constantly varying, both in the rolls of Parliament and in the statutes of the realm. But all this can have nothing to do with the extent of the powers of that officer, of which, however strange it may appear, little is to be found in any of our institutional writers or printed books of record. I therefore more regret that the parties have not favoured us by searching the more ancient records for the terms of the different commissions granted to those individuals, who from time to time enjoyed the office of Lord Advocate at a remote period. The oldest that is given us in these pleadings is that of Sir David Dalrymple in 1709, which places the powers of the Lord Advocate as to civil and criminal cases exactly on the same footing, and confers upon him all the powers competent to our Advocate, "in omnibus actionibus et causis civilibus et criminalibus aliisque." And the same powers, although in general yet comprehensive terms, are certainly conferred on all the subsequent Lords Advocate.

Now, supposing the more ancient patents to be equally broad with that in favour of Sir David Dalrymple, and considering that the Lord Advocate was himself the confidential adviser of the Crown, in all matters connected with the discharge of the duties of his own office, it would require, in my opinion, some more direct authority than I have yet seen, for laying down as clear law, that the Lord Advocate had not the powers of originating actions for the vindication of his Majesty's civil rights, without, first, procuring, founding on, and producing a warrant under the royal sign-manual. And I should hesitate in giving the an argument deduced from cases, however numerous, in which warrants of that description may have been occasionally obtained and founded upon; because I think the use of warrants in such cases may perhaps be explained upon other grounds than that of an inherent incapacity in that high officer of the Crown to proceed without them. The explanation which I would be inclined humbly to offer of the use of special warrants, if I were required to give one, would be this; but which under the present circumstances, I presume to offer with great hesitation and difficulty.

Your Lordships are well aware of the unsettled state of Scotland, from the earliest times down to the period of the Revolution—of the numerous factions into which its aristocracy was divided, and of the jealousies which almost constantly prevailed, not merely between these factions, but between the very officers of the Crown by which the Government was administered. In this way, a sense of personal danger, and of the prudence of exerting their utmost endeavours, to secure their own preservation, must necessarily have induced those confidential servants of the Sovereign, whatever their powers might be, to take as little responsibility upon themselves individually as they possibly could, and to follow out the measures which were determined on under the joint authority of the Privy Council, by which means the responsibility of the particular office, under whose authority each measure was to be carried into execution, was only shared with his other colleagues. By adopting this precaution, there was avoided the risk of giving individual offence to the persons whose rights might be compromised by the measures resolved on, and the hazard of any one servant of the Crown, being either marked out as an object of revenge, or of his being made a sacrifice by others for their own particular security, was effectually provided against.

In applying this to the case of the Lord Advocate, it occurs, that wherever he brought a suit, either civil or criminal, for his Majesty's interest in his own name, he necessarily and inevitably took the whole responsibility of that particular act solely and exclusively upon himself. But, when a warrant issued under the sign-manual, giving authority for any particular proceeding, then the measure, be it what it might, became the act of the Government, for which the King's Advocate was no more responsible than any other of the King's confidential servants. Accordingly, I find this view of the matter strongly confirmed, by a fact which was mentioned yesterday by my brother Lord Medwyn. At no time was it ever questioned that his Majesty's Advocate possessed the full power of raising and pursuing, by his own authority, and without any special warrant, criminal prosecutions for the banishment of offenders of all kinds and descriptions; yet it is an unquestioned fact, and as such my brother stated it, that, at various times, more particularly during the seventeenth century, and under the reign of Charles II. and James VII., special warrants were actually applied for and obtained, authorizing his Majesty's Advocate to prosecute individuals for crimes even before the Court of Justiciary. In particular, such warrants were obtained in most of the prosecutions raised against the Covenanters, and a variety of others. Now, in all these cases the powers of the Lord Advocate were ample, and the use of the special warrants can in them, I apprehend, only be explained by the unwillingness of the person holding the office at the time, to incur the responsibility of the individual from the very natural anxiety which the nature of most of those prosecutions, and the state of public feeling at the time, produced, that the obloquy might be shared with the rest of the servants of the Crown. In the same way, I suspect that the introduction of the case of special warrants in civil causes, may be accounted for, and I regret that more enquiry has not been made into, and light thrown upon this part of the subject, of which I have no doubt it is very susceptible.

Two reported cases, however, have been referred to as having occurred previous to the Union, in which our predecessors are said to have held, that without a special warrant the Lord Advocate had no right to pursue in vindication of the civil rights of the Crown. The first of these is the case of Southesk<sup>1</sup>—the other is that of the King's Advocate against Moncreiff, decided in 1693. As to the first of these, I must state that it certainly does not appear that the Lord Advocate was in any way a party to the suit, except as having given his concurrence to the action between the parties. Certainly he was neither pursuer nor defender; and although the report bears, "that the Lords would not allow the Advocate to insist on the King's interest without a special writ," that point does not appear to have been raised for discussion, and the judgment could only have had reference to the right of his Majesty's Advocate to give his concurrence to the actions (and that too apparently to both parties, who each founded upon a grant from the Crown), without a special authority from the King. But the principles which might operate in such a question are quite different from those which must regulate cases having reference not to the concurrence of his Majesty's Advocate, but to cases where the King's own interest is immediately and necessarily involved. But besides, Lord Medwyn mentioned that this was a case which was decided when his Royal Highness the Duke of York and Albany (afterwards James VII.) thought fit to honour the Court with his presence, an honour which, we all know, was seldom or never conferred, except when some undue purpose was in contemplation, and some act of tyranny and oppression meant to be carried through. The very circumstance of the Duke's presence therefore would, in truth, lead me to suspect that undue means were resorted to in order to obtain the decision; and it would be something more than the bare announcement of a proposition, on a point of constitutional law given by the Court under such superintendence, when the subject was not argued, nor the matter particularly in issue, which it certainly was not, that would induce me to listen to it as an authority to be held as conclusive.

With respect to the other case, it is assuredly more directly in point. But even that is one not decided in the ordinary course of justice, for the report bears that it was determined in presence of the Lord Chancellor; and when I consider the principles on which our predecessors in that case seem to have proceeded, I cannot join with your Lordship in conferring upon it that praise to which you have just said you thought it was entitled. On the contrary, the views of the Court, as I find them explained in the Report, have certainly not tended to exalt my opinion either of the dignity or the independence exhibited by our predecessors on that occasion. It seems to have been debated among the Judges, whether a special reference should not have been made to the Crown, to know the ground on which his Majesty had proceeded in making the two pretended grants then under discussion, and the proposal was only overruled, because it was deemed wrong to able the King with points of law, "and that it would reflect on the secretaries, the King should say, that one or both were impetrate from him, without making an understand the state of the case." No. 95.

Now, considering that this judgment was pronounced only five years after the evolution, I must suspect that our predecessors had not then had time to shake themselves free from the state of dependence and subserviency under which they were kept during the arbitrary, tyrannical, and profligate reigns of the House of Stuart, or had got their minds disencumbered of that fear of giving offence to the King or the members of the Cabal, by which, for so many years, they had been so gracefully restrained. Dec. 24, 1836
King's Advocate v. Lord Dundas.

But these decisions, in whatever light they may be considered, are, I think, more or less counterbalanced by the fact, that there is no form of summons to be found in any ancient style-books, as far as I know, and particularly, there are none in Dalrymple's Collection (which was not given to the world till some years after the decision in the case of Moncrieff), in which the Lord Advocate, as suing for his Majesty's interest in a civil process, is made to libel on a special warrant; and I must believe, considering the great and acknowledged accuracy of that author, that if such warrant had, in all civil causes in which his Majesty's Advocate pursued for the King's interest, been required to validate the proceeding, it would not have been found particularly set forth.

But I fairly acknowledge, that this matter may be considered as coming now under our consideration under different circumstances from that in which it was presented to our predecessors, in the case of Moncrieff, and if the numerous cases which were detailed yesterday, as having occurred since the Union, in which special warrants, under the Sign-manual, have been founded upon by the Lord Advocate, and held necessary by the Court, cannot be otherwise explained, I should, for all, be inclined to hold, that the safest course for us to follow now would be to determine that such warrants were requisite to entitle the Lord Advocate to appear for the Crown in a civil process. I believe that the King has occasionally limited the powers of the Lord Advocate, by the terms of the commission conferred upon him, and it is very possible that it is competent for the Crown to do so again; but I can have no doubt that, by a long train of practice, and a series of judgements, in which it has been found, that particular powers are not vested in the Lord Advocate, such, though originally inherent in his office, may be altogether taken away. At the same time, I would speak with hesitation in reference to those cases, because one of them, rested on by Lord Medwyn, in which the necessity of a special warrant, to authorize the appearance of the Lord Advocate, was supposed to have been at least partially settled, has been otherwise explained; and I am satisfied, that nothing can be inferred from the rights of patronage conferred upon his Majesty's Advocate by the statute relative to the forfeited estates; for by it, in truth, the Crown was divested of its legal rights, in favour of Commissioners, and therefore it was necessary to confer those special powers upon the Lord Advocate, without which undoubtedly he could have no right to appear for his Majesty's interest.

I therefore am desirous of giving no decided opinion as to the necessity of the Lord Advocate founding on a special warrant, until I shall have an opportunity of considering the matter more at large in a case in which the point shall be more fully brought before us, and in which his Lordship shall appear as prosecutor for his Majesty. But I can have no doubt upon this other point, that if, in this case, the summons should be held to be so drawn, that, according to Lord Medwyn's opinion, the instance as set forth is to be taken as that of the King's Advocate for his Majesty's interest, as well as for the Commissioners of Woods and Forests, and that a special warrant was requisite for authorizing his Majesty's Advocate to appear in the former of these two characters, the subsequent production of a warrant, with the view of validating what had gone before, is a proceeding utterly and entirely inept. In that view of the matter, the summons, if it is to be taken as at the instance of his Majesty's Advocate for his Majesty's interest, must be held to have been from the beginning void and null, and by no subsequent proceeding on the part of the Crown could that original nullity be cured.

I cannot, however, allude to this warrant without observing on the singular terms in which it is drawn. The King is made to declare his royal will and pleasure, and "does hereby ratify and confirm the whole proceedings in the said action prior to the date thereof:" and thereafter follows the authority to the Lord Advocate, to carry on such action or actions as may be necessary for setting the right of the defenders aside. Now I deny that the King had any right or power to ratify and confirm one of those proceedings, and the terms employed with that view bring the document in question as nearly as can well be imagined to the style and nature of those letters and warrants which were condemned in the claim of right, when James VII. forfeited the Crown; and my learned friend, the Lord Advocate, will find, that in that very case of Moncrieff, which was mentioned, that when it was proposed, "that the King's Advocate might apply to see if his Majesty would give him a warrant to quarrel Ready's right, the plurality of the Lords thought it of dangerous example, and infringing on the claim of right, to stop justice either by letters to or for from the Session."

(The Lord Advocate here rose to explain, that the letter only confirmed and ratified the acts of the Advocate, in regard to the relation between him and the Crown).

LORD MEADOWBANK (in continuance). I rather think my friend the Lord Advocate is mistaken, for the warrant in the first place contains a direct ratification of all that had been previously done, and it is after that ratification that it is made to apply to the proceedings of his Majesty's Advocate; but it is of little importance, for it is impossible to suppose, and I certainly do not, that any thing improper was intended to be done by the proceeding in question.

I am, however, of opinion, that we have no opportunity here of pronouncing any judgment as to the necessity of a special warrant in this case, or of the effect of that warrant which has been granted; for I am very clearly of your Lordship's opinion, and upon the grounds which you have so fully explained, that there is here only one instance set forth in the summons, that of the Lord Advocate in behalf of his Majesty, as having an interest in the rights conveyed to his Commissioners of Woods and Forests—and I agree also with your Lordship, that it was only intended, when the action was raised, that his Lordship should appear as pursuer in that, and in no other character.

I shall not repeat what has been stated by your Lordship upon this point (and in which I entirely concur), but I shall add that I have no doubt, that had it been intended by the Lord Advocate that his interest should have been used for the interest of the King, as separate from the rights of the Commissioners of Woods and Forests, and for the rights which his Majesty enjoyed jure coronæ, he would have adopted that style and form which he follows every day in the criminal court—which has been invariably pursued by his predecessors in all civil actions, when they were pursuers for the King—and which is to be found in the books of styles from the earliest times (including Dallas), down to the present day. That form, your Lordships are aware, was one which could have called the defenders (even if both pursuers were to be included in one action) to answer at the instance of “our trusty and well-beloved Francis Jeffrey, our Advocate for our interest, and of the said Francis Jeffrey in behalf of us, and of the Commissioners, &c. in terms of an act,” &c. “and to our, and to whose great hurt and prejudice, as acting for us in virtue of the said acts,” &c. This is the nature of the style which has been uniformly followed, without any exception, from the earliest times. It is the style given in Dallas, and I cannot believe that there was any intention whatsoever to alter or to change it upon the occasion.

We have, however, all heard of the great powers of his Majesty’s Advocate, many more than there is any authority for, many which I do not believe to exist, and many which, I am sure, my Right Honourable Friend will never think of exerting. But there is one power which most assuredly the Lord Advocate does not possess. He has no power to alter the forms of proceedings in this Court, established either by special enactment, or by a course of practice followed for centuries; and were I not satisfied that the form which has been adopted is one applying solely to the case of the Lord Advocate, suing in behalf of the Commissioners of Woods and Forests, I would have been against sustaining his instance for the interest of the King, merely because it was set forth in a new and unprecedented form.

I would only observe farther upon this point, which I do not think your Lordship adverted to, that the meaning as to who are the parties forming the instance in this action, is explained by the words following the annunciation of the name of the Lord Advocate, and for whom he pursues. These words are, “pursuers, to whose great hurt and prejudice, as acting for us and the public, in virtue of the said acts.” Now, to say nothing of the want of the words “for our interest,” which are here omitted, there is here an express limitation of the term pursuers, to those who had rights conferred upon them by the act of the 3d and 4th of his present Majesty, a limitation totally inconsistent and incompatible with the suit having been raised by his Majesty’s Advocate for his Majesty’s interest, as connected with the high and patrimonial rights of the Crown.

But this part of the case does not rest here. Both your Lordships have referred to the case of Campbell, one which I concur in thinking is most material in the present. That, it will be attended to, was one of the first cases brought after the accession of the King. It originated under new and special legislative enactments, by which particular boards were authorized to litigate through the means of the Lord Advocate. Upon that occasion, therefore, it was incumbent upon the law officers in Scotland to consider well the form of the writs under which said actions were subsequently to be raised, and it cannot be doubted that much pains were taken to render it perfect. Accordingly, for the purpose which was then in view, namely, to set forth the instance of the Lord Advocate, as suing in behalf of the Boards, then supposed to be vested with those rights of the Crown involved in the case at issue, I think the form adopted was sufficiently correct. But the question considered is, whether the parties, his Majesty’s Advocate, under the summons was framed, or the defender, or the counsel at the Bar, or your Lordships, ever for one moment imagined that in that summons was, comprehended not only the instance of the Lord Advocate for the Lords of the Treasury (and afterwards for the Woods and Forests), but also the instance of his Majesty's Advocate for his Majesty's interest. Now, upon this point, the report of the case is perfectly decisive, for it is made to conclude with the observation of the Dean of Faculty, to the effect that he craved expenses, because the case was, with a Board. "If his Majesty had been a party," he is made to add, "then I could not have asked expenses;" and this observation was not only not contradicted by the pursuer, but not observed upon by the Bench. On the contrary, it was acquiesced in upon all sides, as an observation justly and properly applied to the case. I certainly do not know if his Majesty's Advocate was himself present, when these proceedings took place, but the Solicitor-General undoubtedly was, and if he had not known that it was a suit raised at the instance of his Majesty's Advocate, as pursuing for the Commissioners of Woods and Forests, and altogether conclusive of that of representing the interest of the Crown, there can be no doubt that he would not have suffered the remark of the Dean of Faculty to have escaped his animadversion, or your Lordships to have decided upon the ground that the Crown was not a party, when he himself knew and believed it to be otherwise.

Now, the summons in that case is in the precise form and terms of the summons in the present; and when, on the one hand, your Lordships have an old and inveterate form of summons when the King's Advocate pursues for his Majesty's interest, not followed, but abandoned, and another form, under new enactments, drawn up with a view to the constitution of an instance, under which his Majesty's Advocate has been held to pursue, not for his Majesty's interest, but for the Commissioners of Woods and Forests, it would be a most extraordinary proceeding to hold that the latter form was to be so interpreted now, as to include the former, as well as the instance to which alone it had been determined to refer.

I am very clear, therefore, for rejecting the present as a summons raised at the instance of his Majesty's Advocate for his Majesty's interest; and it would now have been incumbent upon me, had your Lordship not gone so fully into this part of the case, to have shown the grounds upon which I have arrived at the conclusion that the Lord Advocate, as pursuing on behalf of his Majesty, as represented by the Commissioners of Woods and Forests, has no title to pursue this action. But, subscribing to every thing stated by your Lordship upon this part of the case, I shall confine myself to a very few general observations regarding it.

And, first, in my humble opinion, it is plain that, down to the accession of the present King, the patrimonial right of the Monarch to these revenues was continued in the same situation as they were held by James the Sixth and his descendants, including King William and Queen Mary, and Queen Anne, as well as the first Princes of the House of Hanover. At the accession of none of those monarchs was there any abandonment of these rights, either express or implied. Each King just succeeded, jure coronæ, to his predecessor, as former Kings of Scotland had done from the earliest times; and although, in some of the more recent instances, statutes are no doubt to be found in which mention is made of the revenues being reserved "for the life" of the monarch, there is not a syllable to be found from which it can be inferred that that life-interest was either made, or intended to be made, at all different from the interest enjoyed by those monarchs who possessed them in the fullest and most ample manner.

But, at the commencement of the present reign, a great change was certainly made in relation to the hereditary revenue of the Crown in this country. His Majesty then abandoned to the disposal of Parliament those revenues, and the first statute passed after that event upon this subject, authorized a transference of the powers which had been possessed with reference to these revenues by the Court of Exchequer to the Commissioners of Woods and Forests. But the only right in the Court of Exchequer was that of advising his Majesty respecting the disposal and collection of that revenue, that Court having come into the place, and being vested with many of the powers of the Lord High Treasurer of Scotland. Accordingly, the very grant in favour of the noble defender, bears to have been made by and with the advice "of the Lord Chief Baron, and others the Barons of his Majesty's Court of Exchequer." Hence it is plain, that the Barons had no persona standi for suing out any process in behalf of the King; and, therefore, nothing can be founded on the statute just referred to as conveying any corresponding right to the Commissioners of Woods and Forests, and the Lord Advocate suing on their behalf.

No. 9:
Dec. 24, 1
King's Ad
v. 1st Dunglass.

We come, therefore, to consider the effects of the statutes of the 3d and 4th of his present Majesty, as well as the enactments of 10th Geo. IV. cap. 50, which were therein embodied, and which I shall content myself with saying, were most clearly limited to matters connected with the management of the revenue, and conferred upon them no powers to remove officers of a condition different from those whom they were thereby authorized to appoint. On the contrary, I am clear that, by the clauses to which your Lordship referred, all power of challenging appointments of a higher nature, such as that now in question, were specially and distinctly reserved from the powers conferred upon the Commissioners; and, therefore, I have no doubt that the Commissioners of Woods and Forests, and the Lord Advocate suing for them, as acting in behalf of the Crown, has no right to insist in the present action.

In delivering this judgment, I beg leave to add, that, although I think his Majesty's Advocate has in this case fallen into two errors, 1st, In thinking that this action of reduction was competent at the suit of the Commissioners of Woods and Forests, and of himself acting in their behalf; and, 2dly, In thinking that an action, first raised by these Commissioners in his name, could be divided into an action brought by him for the interest of the Crown, and into another as brought in his name for the interest of the King and of the Commissioners of Woods and Forests, I entertain no doubt, that if it was ultra vires of the Crown to grant the present commission, there can be no difficulty in finding a form of action by which it may be competently reduced and set aside; and if the advisers of the Crown shall think fit to bring the matter again before us, they will find all those difficulties they have hitherto had to encounter easily removed, simply by adopting those forms of action which their predecessors have in former cases followed out without objection or difficulty. But if that course should be followed, I trust I may be allowed to express a hope, that they will afford us some further information, on which very little light has been thrown in the present discussions; and, in particular, I would venture to recommend, that a search should be made through the Record of the Great Seal, in order to ascertain what has been the nature and extent of the ~~rights~~ with respect to the other hereditary, as well as what are termed ~~revenues~~ of the Crown of Scotland. I have great reason to believe, : on the main subject more immediately in question will be there

15. obtained, as there can be no doubt that few years have elapsed since the Revolution without some part of that revenue having been dealt with by the Crown, and grants of it conferred, either to one extent or another, by the different monarchs who, during that period, have exercised the rights of the Crown.

At present I am, on the different grounds to which I have referred, for sustaining the objection to the title of the Lord Advocate, as pursuing for the Commissioners of Woods and Forests, and finding that, as with respect to the Lord Advocate's claim to be held as a pursuer for his Majesty's interest, the same has not been set forth in such terms as to authorize your Lordships to entertain him as a pursuer in that character.

LORD GLENLEE said, that on the whole facts of the case, he concurred with their Lordships, that it was a case merely at the instance of the Commissioners of Woods and Forests, and there was consequently a want of title to pursue a reduction. There was not a sufficient title in the Commissioners, nor was it ever intended to give any such title. He was disposed also to agree in the view taken by their Lordships, and say that the Signal-manual was necessary.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"The Lords having resumed consideration of this process, with the cases for the parties, and heard counsel thereon, sustain the objection to the title of the pursuers to insist in these actions; dismiss the same accordingly, and decern; find the Commissioners of Woods and Forests liable to the defenders in the expenses of process; allow the accounts to be given in, and thereafter remit to the auditor to tax the same, and to report."

a. 24, 1836. THIS was an incidental application in the cause reported ante, p. 48, Division, and XIV. p. 313.

At the commencement of the process of multiplepoinding there mentioned, the raisers (trustees of the late Lord Breadalbane) lodged a condescendence of the fund in medio, as to which the usual interlocutor was pronounced finding them liable in once and single payment. The fund consisted principally of Bank of England and Government stock, and was allowed to remain invested as before. The Marquis and Marchioness of Chandos made a claim for a very large share of the fund in medio. In 1834 the British Linen Company advanced to them £20,000, and obtained an assignation to Lady Chandos's claim of legitim, and to every other claim competent to her and Lord Chandos against the trust-funds. The claim of legitim was disposed of by the judgment of January 20, 1836, which was affirmed on appeal, and on 19th November the Court granted interim decree in favour of Lord and Lady Chandos for a payment of £70,000, which decree was extracted. The trust-funds were attached by arrestments at the instance of Lord Chandos; immediately after which proceeding an injunction from the Court of Chancery in England was intimated to all parties, prohibiting the Marquis and Marchioness of Chandos from receiving, and the trustees from making, any payment under the judgment of 20th January. This injunction had been obtained in consequence of the dependence of certain proceedings in the Court of Chancery for having the contract of marriage between Lord and Lady Chandos "reformed" so as to exclude her ladyship's claims of legitim, on the ground that such was the real intention of the parties to the marriage-contract, though in framing it this had not been effectually carried into execution.*

The British Linen Company thereafter lodged a riding claim in the process of multiplepoinding as creditors and assignees of Lord and Lady Chandos to the extent of £20,000, and forthwith presented a petition, referring to the proceedings recently commenced in the Vice-Chancellor's

* The following statement of the general nature of these proceedings is given in the answers for Lord Breadalbane:—"While the question formerly raised in this present process, whether the respondent was entitled to legitim or not, was in dependence before the House of Lords, the respondent discovered certain documents having reference to the marriage-contract of Lord and Lady Chandos. This latter deed, as your Lordships know, was strictly an English deed, and one which could therefore be interpreted only according to the law of England. The respondent was advised, that by the law of that country, this deed was not conclusive as to the rights of the parties thereto, if it could be shown to be, by omission of important clauses, drawn in violation of or contrary to the intention of the parties. He was further advised, that the documents and other evidence he had recently discovered were sufficient to prove that the deed had not been so drawn.

"The chief parties to this deed, and the parties truly interested in the question, were Lord and Lady Chandos, and the trustees of the late Marquess. The respondent, therefore, filed a bill in Chancery against these parties, praying that Court to reform the contract of marriage, so as to make it consistent with the intention of the parties, and in the mean time to grant injunction against Lord and Lady Chandos from receiving, and against the trustees from paying to Lord or Lady Chandos, any part of the funds under your Lordships' judgment in the multiplepoinding. That was, and is, the whole amount of the proceeding which the respondent has adopted. It was not a rash or unadvised proceeding, because it has been a successful one; the injunction (which the respondent understands is a strong probable case is made out) has been granted by the Court, and the question having been appealed, has been thought worthy of consideration by the Lord Chancellor, who has not as yet pronounced

1. 26. Court, praying, 1st, To have the Breadalbane trustees ordained
 N. 1836. to consign the fund in medio, or part thereof, in manibus curiæ; and, 2dly, & Linen To have the trustees and the Marquis of Breadalbane interdicted "from May v. removing the same, or any part thereof, out of your Lordships' jurisdicalbanu tion, or from adopting and following forth any proceedings or measur-vs. whatsoever or wheresoever, directly or indirectly, whereby your Lon-ships' jurisdiction and control over the same, or your right and power dispose thereof, as the admitted fund in medio in the said multiplepoinding, may be in any respect interfered with or infringed upon."

The trustees and Lord Breadalbane gave in answers opposing the prayer of the petition. On the petition and answers being put out to be advised, Lord and Lady Chandos, without having put in a minute, made appearance to consent to the prayer.

On the part of the British Linen Company a proposal was made to have the advising of the petition superseded till January, on the ground of certain notes having been printed by the respondents, and appended to their papers, professing to be a report of proceedings in the English Court of Chancery, but this proposal was not acceded to.

The interim-decree for £70,000 having been pronounced and extracted before the company had lodged their riding claim on Lady Chandos' interest, the Court intimated that, in the present application for consignation of the fund, the consignation of this sum was out of the question.

In support of the prayer of the petition it was contended for the British Linen Company and for Lord Chandos, that the effect of the recent proceedings instituted in Chancery might be to withdraw the fund in medio from the jurisdiction of the Court and place it under the control of a foreign tribunal—that it was necessary for the protection of the interests of all parties that it should no longer be left in jeopardy but consigned in Court—that after a condescendence of the fund had been lodged in a process of multiplepoin ding any claimant was entitled to insist for consignation, and that this was competent at any stage of the proceedings—that the present petitioners were justified in their demand by the course of practice and in the circumstances of the case, and that the Vice-Chancellor's injunction did not affect them, however it might affect Lord Chandos, with whom they were no way identified.

It was answered for the trustees and Lord Breadalbane, that this application, which was entirely a matter for the discretion of the Court, was uncalled for and inexpedient, no objection whatever being stated against the sufficiency of the trustees or the propriety of their management—that not only would it be inconvenient and prejudicial to the interests of all parties to interfere with the management or mode of investment of the trust funds, but the present application to that effect was moreover incompetent, as it was made by a party who had a mere riding interest on the interest of Lord Chandos, claimed upon at a late stage of the proceedings, and which had not yet been seen or answered, far less sustained by a decree in the process, and that the proceedings in Chancery threatened no removal of the trust-funds from the jurisdiction of the Court or interference with that jurisdiction.

On the part of the trustees it was stated in addition, that they had not in any way made themselves parties to or acknowledged the Chancery proceedings in England—that they considered themselves amenable to the Scotch courts, and should take no step which could make it be assumed against them that they were doing any thing to aid the removal of the trust-funds out of the jurisdiction of those courts.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I think the petition ought to be refused in toto. The interim-decree in favour of Lord Chandos has been extracted, and arrestments have been laid on the fund in medio to the extent of £70,000, which will effectually secure the petitioners. As to the prayer for an interdict against the funds being removed, the trustees show no intention of withdrawing them from our jurisdiction. The funds are virtually already in manibus curiæ.

LORD GLENLEE.—I am of the same opinion.

LORD MEADOWBANK.—I am rather inclined either to remit this petition to the Lord Ordinary, before whom the process is depending, or to delay advising. I concur with counsel in thinking that nothing can be more inexpedient than to have the proceedings of courts misrepresented to each other. I cannot hold these notes to be the proper mode of bringing the proceedings in Chancery before us. I throw them out of view altogether. Judicially I do not know, and am not bound to believe, that such proceedings have taken place, no authenticated record of them or judgment of the Court of Chancery being produced to us. Until a definitive judgment of that Court is laid before us I can pay no attention to its proceedings. In regard to the present case, the only proceedings with which we have to do are the judgment of the Lord Ordinary in the multiplepoinding, the judgment of this Court, and that of the House of Lords. We have granted an interim-decree for £70,000, which is all that the trustees say they can afford to pay over; but they have still extensive funds in their hands, as to which Lord Chandos has got a finding that they are due to him. In the exercise of our judicial discretion I should not willingly in this case give an order for consignation, yet I would rather postpone consideration of the petition or remit it to the Lord Ordinary.

LORD MEDWYN.—I cannot hold that the nature of the present process precludes a claim for consignation, as I think such claim is competent, if properly brought forward. I confess I do not like this appearance of Lord Chandos. Who is it that asks for consignation? The petitioners are merely creditors of Lord Chandos. They make their claim as his special assignees, and I cannot understand how they can be free of him. As to the £70,000, their claim as a riding interest on that is out of the question. In regard to its effect otherwise, it has only been given in the other day, and has not even been seen or answered, and I do not see what ground there is to justify this secondary claimant demanding an order for consignation. We assure the trustees that they consider the fund in their possession as a British fund, and that they have no intention of withdrawing it.

- o. 96. Although consignation has not been granted, the fund may still be said to be in the hands of the Court. It is so in reality. In the general case there is no doubt that consignation in a bank is usually ordered on the motion of a claimant; but here we are not asked by a primary claimant to have the fund consigned; and I cannot listen to the secondary party asking consignation of what is virtually already in manibus curiæ and quite safe. Besides, no particular ground is alleged for the demand, as that the trustees are insolvent or likely to be so, or incapable of managing the funds. As to the prayer for an interdict, I think it indecent even to suppose any proceeding being adopted in a foreign court, with the view of removing the funds from our jurisdiction.

THE COURT accordingly refused the petition, with expenses.

ALEXANDER PATRICK, Defender.—Robertson—Wilson.

Proof—Deposition to lie in retentis—Witness—Infamy—Messenger's Execution.—1. The deposition taken to lie in retentis of a witness who was not proved to be dead or permanently disabled from attending the trial, not allowed to be read, although the witness had been seen two months before in bad health, and the party proposing to read the deposition had made an unsuccessful search for him. 2. A conviction on a confession entered on the record of a crime inferring infamy, followed by sentence, has the same effect in regard to the disqualification of a witness as a conviction after trial by jury. 3. A party proposing to adduce a witness who had been convicted of forgery and sentenced to imprisonment must, in order to make the witness admissible, prove that the sentence has been undergone; but this it is competent to do by parole evidence. 4. In a simple reduction of a decree of suspension the party who had as messenger signed the execution of intimation of sist, but was subsequently deprived of his office, allowed to be called as a witness to disprove his own execution; but observed that his evidence required to be scrupulously considered.

- 28, 1836. IN June 1833, the defender, Patrick, presented a bill of suspension of a charge on a bill of exchange given by the pursuer, Aitchison, whereupon the Lord Ordinary pronounced the usual interlocutor granting assist, and ordering intimation and answers within fourteen days. The messenger employed to intimate the sist was one William Dinning, who returned to the Bill-Chamber an execution of the intimation bearing, that on 12th June, 1833, he served on Aitchison the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, "a full double whereof, with a just copy of intimation for, and directed to the said John Aitchison, thereto attached, I delivered to himself personally, apprehended at Bauton, before these witnesses, John Honan and James Ewing, both residents in Glasgow, and hereto with sion had not been validly served on him, but had been sent in y post, and had not reached him till the 15th of June, the exe-turned by Dinning being thus inconsistent with the fact; that f suspension was consequently passed before elapse of the requi-for lodging answers; and finally, that the letters of suspension on the passed bill had not been regularly executed.

efence was, generally, that the proceedings in question being d regular, and improbation of the executions not being proponed, ns of suspension and reduction were groundless and untenable.

duction having been conjoined with the process of suspension, ord made up, the following issues were sent to trial.

1836 v.

The question was subsequently departed from, the witness's knowledge of the handwriting appearing to be insufficient.

The pursuer proposed to read Honan's deposition, which had been taken to lie in retentis, upwards of two years ago, when he was in bad health. Honan had been seen about two months ago in bad health, since which time the pursuer had caused a search to be made for him, but unsuccessfully.

Robertson, for the defender, objected, that as Honan was neither dead nor permanently disabled from attending the trial, it was incompetent to read the deposition; what was alleged by the pursuer being no sufficient reason for allowing this, however good ground it might have been for delaying the trial.

The Court refused to allow the deposition to be read.

The pursuer proposed to call Dinning, the messenger above-mentioned, as a witness.

Robertson, for the defender, objected to Dinning's admissibility; 1st, that he had been convicted of forgery before the Circuit Court of Justiciary at Glasgow, in April 1834; 2d, that it was incompetent to call a messenger to disprove his own execution.

In support of the first objection, he produced certified copies of the conviction, which proceeded on the pannel's confession, and of a sentence of imprisonment for 12 months in Bridewell, following thereon.

M'Neill, for the Pursuer.—I do not concede that a conviction on confession, no jury intervening, is sufficient to disqualify. In the present case, the sentence is for imprisonment for 12 months from April, 1834, and we are now here in 1836; the period of Dinning's punishment having expired, he becomes a competent witness, in terms of the statute 1 Will. IV. c. 37. We shall prove, by the books of the Glasgow Bridewell, that his time has been served out.

Robertson.—According to the old rule of law, the witness is clearly incompetent; the statute referred to has introduced an exception, which the pursuer is bound to prove in the most authentic way. The books ought to have been lodged eight days before the trial.

M'Neill.—The requisite period from the date of the sentence of imprisonment having elapsed, the presumption is, that the law has taken its course. The Bridewell books may be produced to meet the defender's objection, but, independent of them, I can prove by parole that Dinning underwent his imprisonment.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I hold that a pannel's confession of a heavy crime entered on the record, and followed by the sentence of the Court, has the same effect in regard to his disqualification, as if a trial had intervened. The pursuer is bound to prove that this party has undergone his sentence of imprisonment, but it is competent for him to do so by parole evidence.

it be competent to call a messenger to disprove his execution, and lify the whole proceedings, and thus shake the security of land-
? Or could a notary, who had put his name to a notarial act, be ned to impugn the facts attested in the instrument? The mesr cannot be called to perjure himself, and we are not in a reductionbation.

Neill.—Messengers are witnesses competent to be examined to on executions, and they are the ordinary and the best witnesses; wise there would be no evidence at all to impugn an execution. In ce, it is common to call instrumentary witnesses to disprove what ted in the testing clause of a deed, which is equally solemn with ecution. A messenger may be called to support an execution,<sup>2</sup> and not to impugn it? Dinning is properly the defender's witness, as an interest adverse to the side on which he is called. Besides, presumption of law is in favour of the admissibility of a witness, and must be clear authority for rejecting him.

THE JUSTICE-CLERK.—I cannot reject this witness. It is said that he peran important duty, and cannot be allowed to disprove his own statement. s true; but an instrumentary witness, when he certifies in the testing clause ook place at the signing of a deed, is, as much as any messenger, dischargimportant duty. Now it is admitted that such a witness may be brought d to disprove what he has so stated; and on this principle, in the absence authority, either by statute or decision, against his admissibility, I must rethe witness, though his evidence may be liable to observation.

ning was accordingly examined, and deponed to the statement in ecution of 12th June, 1833, being inconsistent with the fact.

No. 97. Dence scrupulously weighed;<sup>1</sup> that the second issue depended on the first, as did also the third, for if it appeared that the sist had been duly and regularly intimated, then there was no necessity for executing the letters of suspension.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK directed the jury, that the evidence of Dinning ought to be scrupulously considered, and without they believed it there was no ground for finding for the pursuer on the first issue; and that the second and third issues hinged upon the first, and the findings on them must be regulated accordingly.

THIS was a reduction-improbation of certain bonds granted to the defender by the pursuer over the property of Mossend-green, belonging to him, and of a bill of exchange, on the grounds of facility and circumvention, and minority and lesion. The defender denied the first of these reasons of reduction, and pleaded as to the second, 1st, That the pursuer had taken upon himself the management of his own property, and was engaged in carrying on the business of a farmer on his own account, and that the defender was therefore entitled to transact with him as a person sui juris; 2d, That the money had been in rem versum of the pursuer; 3dly, Homologation since majority.

The following issues were sent for trial:—

“Whether, at the time or times at which all, or any, of the bonds and bills of exchange, Nos. 18, 20, 22, 360 and 3 of process was or were granted by the pursuer, he was a minor, and granted the same to his lesion?

“Whether all, or any, of the said bonds, or the said bill of exchange, was or were, by fraud or misrepresentation, obtained by the defender from the pursuer?

“Whether at the time that the said bonds and bill, or any of them, was, or were granted, the pursuer had the management of his own affairs, and followed the occupation or business of a farmer, and granted the same in the course of his said management, occupation, or business?

THE JURY found for the pursuer on the first issue, except as to the sum of £157, which they found had been laid out for his advantage on the property of Mossend-green; for the defender on the second issue; and for the pursuer on the two alternative issues.

late John Neilson, a workman in the employment of the late Jan. 17, 1837.

Cochrane, farmer at Linwood, in the county of Renfrew, in 2<sup>D</sup> DIVISION.
1802, executed a disposition and settlement conveying all his Ld. Cockburn.
ty, including certain heritable subjects, to his employer, Cochrane.
ed in the following month of April, within sixty days of the date deed, and certain parties named Brock, his nearest relations on the r's side, on the allegation that he had died without heirs, obtained Exchequer a gift of the King's right as ultimus hæres, in virtue of they instituted a reduction, ex capite lecti, of the conveyance of ritage to Cochrane. After some litigation, the Court, by a judgdated February 3, 1809, sustained the reasons of reduction, and d accordingly, and on the 24th May they adhered to this judg-refusing a reclaiming petition for Cochrane. On the 17th of the month, Cochrane, in consideration of a sum of £65, obtained a tion of the deathbed deed from one James Neilson, now deceased, ng the heir-at-law of John Neilson, and this person, on the 20th ity alleged in this service was that James Neilson, the claim-

99. Cochrane immediately thereupon instituted a reduction of the gift of ultimus haeres in favour of Brock, &c. in which the latter were allowed to repeat a reduction of James Neilson's service and retour. In this process, decret in absence was pronounced against Brock, &c. of date February 4, 1814. Subsequently, however, these parties raised a reduction of that decree, and also of the service, in which reduction, after some litigation, decree of absolvitor was pronounced by the Lord Ordinary in 1820, and his Lordship's judgment was not reclaimed against. Some time before this, the present pursuer had, in 1811, purchased a brieve for having himself served heir to John Neilson, granter of the deathbed deed, which having come on for trial before the Bailies of Renfrew, appearance was made for Cochrane, who objected, on the ground of the subsistence of the previous service in favour of the James Neilson from whom he had obtained the deed of ratification. To this objection the pursuer answered that his service was necessary to enable him to set aside the other, which he alleged to be erroneous, and the bailies allowed the service to proceed. To establish his propinquity, the principal witness offered by the pursuer was the James Neilson who had been already served. After an examination in initialibus, however, this proposed witness was rejected, and the pursuer intimating an intention to advocate "abandoned pursuit of the service at this time until the result of the advocacy." No further steps, however, were taken by the pursuer till 1833, when he expedie before the Bailies of Canongate a service as nearest lawful heir of line and conquest to John Neilson, and this he followed up by an action of reduction, concluding to have the conveyance to Cochrane reduced and set aside on the head of deathbed, and also concluding for reduction of the service of James Neilson, and of the deed of ratification granted by him. Besides founding on his service as a title, the pursuer set forth his propinquity to the granter of the deathbed deed, stating himself to be descended of John Neilson of Brownside (brother of the granter's grandfather), by Matthew Neilson, his eldest son, while James Neilson, who had been formerly served, was, as the pursuer alleged, descended from him by James his second son. The ground of reduction applicable to the service was in these terms:—"The foresaid retour of a service in favour of the said deceased James Neilson, the granter of the said deed of ratification, is utterly void and inept, not only in respect that the brieve upon which the said retour proceeded, was not regularly proclaimed by the proper officer, in presence of witnesses, at the proper place of publication, and upon the proper and legal induciae, but also in respect that the character of heir to the said deceased John Neilson, the granter of the foresaid disposition and settlement, did not belong to the said deceased James Neilson, the granter of the foresaid deed of ratification; and accordingly the evidence which was adduced in the service upon which the said retour proceeded, did not, and could not establish that he was entitled to claim that character, which belonged is totally inconsistent with the provisions of the immediately pre-an absolutely unchallengeable title against the true heir. The for-these statutes required forty years' possession resting on infestequally whether these proceeded on charters, retours, or precepts constat, and it is impossible to suppose that in the immediately ling statute the legislature intended to supersede this enactment, or as it regarded retours, and to sustain a title in a party not having e right, founded on a retour after the lapse of only twenty years,

Pleaded for the Defenders—

1. The words of the statute 1617, c. 13, are absolutely exclusive of the construction attempted to be put upon it by the pursuer. It sets forth the act 1494, c. 57, which had established a three years' prescription of retours, and declares that that act was not intended to prejudge the right of the true heir, but only to protect the inquest from a process of error; and then, while it provides that the inquest shall still have the benefit of this triennial prescription, it further enacts that the true heir should not thereby be prejudged of his right to seek reduction of the service "within the space of twenty years," but that, "if the said summons of reduction be not intended, executed, and pursued before the expiry of the said twenty years, that the said action of reduction of the said retour and service, shall prescribe in the selfe, and no party to be heard thereafter to pursue the same reduction."

In conformity to the clear and undoubted meaning of this enactment, all our institutional writers without exception (M'Kenzie having retracted his original opinion to the contrary) hold the exclusion of challenge after twenty years to be absolute;<sup>2</sup> and in the case of Bargany (although the obiter dicta of the judges are doubtless in favour of the pursuer's view), the question was not involved, the retour proving on the face of it that the party served was not the heir, and the judgment expressly found that the vicennial prescription was "not applicable to the case." Nor is there any inconsistency in this construction with the provisions of the act 1617, c. 12, since that act is establishing a protection against all objections by every party, to which effect forty years' infestment and possession was deemed necessary, while the statute enacting the vicennial prescription of retours had reference only to one particular objection, an alleged erroneous retour, brought by another party claiming the character of heir, or some one as in his right, which, considering the perishable nature of the evidence on which services necessarily proceed, it was not unreasonable to limit to a shorter period.

2. As to the alleged interruption, the shorter prescriptions are not subject to interruption properly speaking, but the actions being limited to a certain period the summons in which decree is sought must have been brought within that time, otherwise, whatever previous proceedings may have taken place, it must necessarily be inept.<sup>3</sup> But besides, in regard to the proceedings

Entail—Clause.—In a deed of entail certain acts were expressly prohibited, and, inter alia, selling or alienation of the estate ; the irritant and resolute clause commenced with a general declaration—"in case the heirs of tailzie shall contravene or fail in performing any part of the premises"—then went on to specify the prohibited acts—"particularly by neglecting to assume," &c., "or by possessing," &c., and concluded with a repetition of the previous general declaration ; in the special enumeration the prohibition against alienation was omitted ;—Held, notwithstanding, that the heirs of entail were not entitled to sell, and that the prohibition so omitted was protected by the general declaration.

- 17, 1837. In the year 1780, the Rev. Archibald Rennie executed a deed of — entail of the lands of Balliliesk in favour of himself in liferent, and, after Division. his decease, of Archibald Hill, and other heirs-substitute. The deed, d Jeffrey. after specially providing that the heirs succeeding to the estate should
 R. be obliged to assume the name of Rennie, contained the following prohibitions :—"With this limitation and restriction, that it shall not be lawful to, nor in the power of the said Archibald Hill, nor any others of the heirs of tailzie aforesaid, to alter, innovate, or infringe this present tailzie, and the order and course of succession before mentioned ; or to sell, alienate, or burden the lands and others above disposed, or any part thereof, or contract debts, or grant bond, or any other right or security whatsoever, which may any ways burden or affect the said lands and estate, or do any other fact or deed, civil or criminal, directly or indirectly, whereby the said estate, or any part thereof, may be adjudged, confiscated, forfeited, or any ways evicted, in prejudice of the succeeding heirs of tailzie ; and with this limitation also, that it shall not be in the power of the said Archibald Hill, or the other heirs of tailzie aforesaid, to set tacks of the said estate, or any part thereof, for longer space than nineteen years, nor the park in which the principal house and office-houses stand, nor the park lying immediately on the west side thereof, neither the said principal house and offices, longer than the lifetime of the setter, without any diminution of the rental, except in the case of evident necessity, in which case the said tacks are to be set up by public roup, after intimation thereof three several Sundays preceding the roup, at the parish church where the lands lye."

The irritant and resolute clauses were as follows :—"And in case the said Archibald Hill, or any of the heirs of tailzie before mentioned, shall contravene or fail in performing any part of the premises, particularly by neglecting to assume, use, and bear the surname of Rennie, or by possessing the foresaid estate in virtue of any other title than the present tailzie, or by omitting to engross in the whole rights, charters, re-

Horne v.
Rennie.

The entailor died in 1786, and was succeeded by Archibald Hill, the institute, who took infeftment under the entail, and obtained confirmation from the superior. The entail was recorded the same year. This party was succeeded by the respondent, Archibald Hill Rennie, who entered into minutes of sale of the estate of Balliliesk with the suspender, Donald Horne, W.S., and bound himself to deliver to him a valid disposition to the lands.

Horne then brought a suspension of a threatened charge for payment of the price, on the ground of the seller's inability to give him a valid disposition, having no power to alienate. A record was made up on reasons of suspension, the respondent pleading, that he was entitled to grant a disposition, as the irritant and resolute clauses of the entail, which professed to enumerate the particular prohibitions mentioned in the preceding clauses, made no mention of the prohibition against alienation, and were therefore defective.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor, with the note subjoined:—"In respect that the prohibition against selling con-

"There is a shade of distinction between this case and that of Tillicoultry, 15th January, 1799 (Mor. 15539), inasmuch as the defective enumeration in the resolute clause begins in that case with the words, 'either by not assuming the name and arms,' &c., and in this case with the words, 'particularly by neglecting to assume the name,' &c. But they coincide in that cardinal defect on which the Lord Ordinary has always understood the case of Tillicoultry to have proceeded, and the law to have been settled ever since the affirmance of the judgment in the House of Lords, viz. the total omission of any express reference to the prohibition against selling, in an irritant and resolute clause, framed on the principle of disavowing and enumerating the several prohibitions, and not on that of a general reference to them, as detailed in a preceding part of the deed.

No. 99. to indicate an acquiescence of the profession and of the public, in the opinion given out by the professed authors on the law, in so clear and in so decided a manner.

Ilson v. Stair's Re-constituted. The case referred to by M'Kenzie, 22d November, 1665, Younger v. Johnston was not then decided, but it was finally determined 28th November, 1665, Stair's Decisions, vol. i. p. 315, and there the Court were of opinion, and found 'the reduction of retours to prescribe sooner than other rights.'

We consider the case of Bargany to be in no ways applicable to the present. It was a very peculiar and circumstantial case. The retour in that case was of a singular nature as to bear in gremio a complete explanation.

Upon the whole, therefore, we are of opinion, that in a question with heirs, the act 1617, c. 13, applies, and that the defender is entitled to plead the benefit thereof.

We may add in conclusion, that as to all the consequences that may be deducible from this unavoidable interpretation of the law, we cannot prejudicate; that must be left, if required, to legislative interference.

LORD MONCREIFF.—Though it is not without considerable difficulty, I concur in the result of the above written opinion. But, as I cannot concur in the view taken in it of the statute 1617, c. 13, I think it proper to explain the ground of my opinion.

The institutional writers have been greatly at a loss to determine what is the precise meaning and effect of the act 1617, c. 13, so as to render it not inconsistent with the immediately preceding statute 1617, c. 12. This last act provides that men shall not be disturbed in the enjoyment of their estates, who have bruik or possessed them by virtue of infeftments made to them by the King, or other superior or author, 'for the space of forty years,' provided they can produce either a charter preceding the entry of the forty years' possession, with seisin on it, or, where there is no charters, instruments of seisin, 'standing together for the space of forty years, either proceeding upon retours, or upon precepts of clare constat;' which rights are declared to be 'valid and sufficient rights, being clad with the said peaceable and continual possession of forty years, without any lawful interruption,' &c. The act 1617, c. 13, on the narrative of the act 1494, by which summonses of error against the determinations of inquests were declared to prescribe, if not pursued within three years, provides that that act shall not prejudice the nearest of kin to seek reduction of such retours within twenty years, and that if the summons "be not intended, executed and pursued within the space of twenty years," &c. the action of reduction shall prescribe, and no one be heard to insist in it.

I cannot think that the second of these acts has an indiscriminate application to all retours, or to all grounds of challenge, or that the two acts can be reconciled simply on the ground that the last relates only to one of the titles mentioned in the first. For to say that two or more infeftments, proceeding on a retour of service, and clad with forty years' possession (as equivalent to charter and seisin with forty years' possession), shall secure the party against every challenge of his title, and to say that a retour alone, with or without seisin, by the mere lapse of twenty years, shall in every case secure a party against any challenge of that title, appears to me to involve a contradiction in principle, which the framers of the first act cannot be supposed to have intended. And it farther appears to me, that such a construction of the act is not reconcileable with the opinions delivered in the case of Bargany.

In general, I think that the act, in the restraining part of it, was intended to protect the parties once served against the necessity of again producing, after twenty years, the proofs of their propinquity in blood to the deceased. Taking this to be the effect of it, though it may also protect against irregularities in the proceedings, I think, though with difficulty, that it must secure the retour in this case against the particular ground of challenge brought against it. My cause of difficulty is this:—The pursuer does not object to the statement of James Neilson's propinquity to John Neilson in Brownside, from whom he drew his descent; he only says that that descent was through the second son of John, while the pursuer is descended of Matthew, an elder son; and if the direct case be put, that A obtained a service as heir of his father, and that after twenty years B, stating himself to be an elder son, absent perhaps at the time, challenged the retour, I should have hesitation in saying that the door was shut against his plain right by the vicennial prescription. I am aware, however, of the case of Younger v. Johnston, 22d November, 1665, and what Mackenzie has said on it in his supplementary note, and only mean to express a doubt on the principle.

But I am of opinion, that, in this case, the retour of James Neilson is of such a nature, according to the statement in the record, as necessarily to bring it within the statutory prescription. He is served nearest heir as being the grandson of John Neilson. In this it is implied, that his father was either the eldest son or the eldest who has left descendants; and as the name of his father does not appear, the ground of challenge set forth in the summons and record is truly an impeachment of the propinquity on which he has been served. I therefore concur with the other Judges in thinking that, in this case, the action is barred by the statute.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I concur with the majority.

LORD GLENLEE concurred.

LORD MEADOWBANK.—That is also my opinion.

LORD MEDWYN.—If a retour be followed by possession, I can understand the prescription being applied to it. But as to latent general services, I cannot suppose it was ever intended that these should prescribe by mere lapse of 20 years. The two acts I look upon as parts of the same law, and I conceive the retours mentioned in the second act are retours of the kind mentioned in the first, as forming part of a title of possession. Here I think there was possession as validating another title. I also conceive interruption would apply to such a case. I concur, however, in the result, though I would wish to guard my opinion.

THE COURT accordingly sustained the third preliminary defence.

IN the year 1780, the Rev. Archibald Rennie executed a deed of entail of the lands of Balliliesk in favour of himself in liferent, and, after his decease, of Archibald Hill, and other heirs-substitute. The deed, after specially providing that the heirs succeeding to the estate should be obliged to assume the name of Rennie, contained the following prohibitions:—"With this limitation and restriction, that it shall not be lawful to, nor in the power of the said Archibald Hill, nor any others of the heirs of tailzie aforesaid, to alter, innovate, or infringe this present tailzie, and the order and course of succession before mentioned; or to sell, alienate, or burden the lands and others above disposed, or any part thereof, or contract debts, or grant bond, or any other right or security whatsoever, which may any ways burden or affect the said lands and estate, or do any other fact or deed, civil or criminal, directly or indirectly, whereby the said estate, or any part thereof, may be adjudged, confiscated, forfeited, or any ways evicted, in prejudice of the succeeding heirs of tailzie; and with this limitation also, that it shall not be in the power of the said Archibald Hill, or the other heirs of tailzie aforesaid, to set tacks of the said estate, or any part thereof, for longer space than nineteen years, nor the park in which the principal house and office-houses stand, nor the park lying immediately on the west side thereof, neither the said principal house and offices, longer than the lifetime of the setter, without any diminution of the rental, except in the case of evident necessity, in which case the said tacks are to be set up by public roup, after intimation thereof three several Sundays preceding the roup, at the parish church where the lands lye."

The irritant and resolute clauses were as follows:—"And in case the said Archibald Hill, or any of the heirs of tailzie before mentioned, shall contravene or fail in performing any part of the premises, particularly by neglecting to assume, use, and bear the surname of Rennie, or by possessing the foresaid estate in virtue of any other title than the present tailzie, or by omitting to engross in the whole rights, charters, re-tours, and infestments, the order of succession and whole conditions, No. 100 provisions, and declarations herein contained, or by altering the order and course of succession above set down; or if they or any of them shall contract debt, or do any deed whereby the said estate or any part thereof may be burdened, evicted, confiscated, or forfeited, or shall set tacks otherwise than as before directed, or shall contravene or fail in any part of the premises; then not only all such acts and deeds of contravention, and debts so to be contracted, shall be, and are hereby declared void and null to all intents and purposes, in so far as the same may affect, burden, evict, or forfeit the said lands and estate, but also the contravener, for himself or herself only, shall ipso facto amit, lose, and forfeit all right, title, and interest in or to the said lands and estate, and the same shall become void and extinct; and the said estate shall devolve, accresce, and belong to the next heir of tailzie appointed to succeed, although descended of the contravener's body, in the same manner as if the contravener were naturally dead, and to establish his or her right in any legal way, free from all debts and deeds of the contravener."

Horne v.
Rennie.

The entailor died in 1786, and was succeeded by Archibald Hill, the institute, who took infestment under the entail, and obtained confirmation from the superior. The entail was recorded the same year. This party was succeeded by the respondent, Archibald Hill Rennie, who entered into minutes of sale of the estate of Balliliesk with the suspender, Donald Horne, W.S., and bound himself to deliver to him a valid disposition to the lands.

Horne then brought a suspension of a threatened charge for payment of the price, on the ground of the seller's inability to give him a valid disposition, having no power to alienate. A record was made up on reasons of suspension, the respondent pleading, that he was entitled to grant a disposition, as the irritant and resolute clauses of the entail, which professed to enumerate the particular prohibitions mentioned in the preceding clauses, made no mention of the prohibition against alienation, and were therefore defective.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor, with the note subjoined:—"In respect that the prohibition against selling con-

* "There is a shade of distinction between this case and that of Tillicoultry, 15th January, 1799 (Mor. 15539), inasmuch as the defective enumeration in the resolute clause begins in that case with the words, 'either by not assuming the name and arms,' &c., and in this case with the words, 'particularly by neglecting to assume the name,' &c. But they coincide in that cardinal defect on which the Lord Ordinary has always understood the case of Tillicoultry to have proceeded, and the law to have been settled ever since the affirmance of the judgment in the House of Lords, viz. the total omission of any express reference to the prohibition against selling, in an irritant and resolute clause, framed on the principle of distinctly reciting and enumerating the several prohibitions, and not on that of a general reference to them, as detailed in a preceding part of the deed.

No. 100. tained in the entail under which the lands of Balliliesk are held by the rne v. clauses thereof, finds that the minutes of sale of the said lands entered nie. into between the said charger and the suspender was a lawful transaction, and such as may and ought to be enforced at the instance of either of the parties ; and therefore repels the reasons of suspension : Finds the letters and charge orderly proceeded, and decerns ; but finds no expenses due."

A reclaiming note having been presented against this judgment, it was considered expedient to call the heirs of entail into the field by a summons of declarator. Appearance was made accordingly for the defender M'Dowall, and other substitute heirs, and the processes of declarator and suspension were thereafter conjoined, and the cause appointed to be argued in Cases.

Pleaded for Archibald Hill Rennie—

Entails are strictissimi juris, and, to render the prohibitions effectual, each of them must be brought under the operation of both the irritant and resolute clauses ; these clauses may be drawn in two forms, either in general terms applying to all the prohibitions, or on the principle of distinctly enumerating every prohibition, and applying to each act separately ; but if the latter form be adopted, and any one of the prohibited acts be omitted in the enumeration, the entail is held to be defective, and the heir in possession is free in respect to the prohibition which has not been recited, whether the enumeration of particulars be accompanied with a general declaration of irritancy or not.<sup>1</sup> If the entailer think fit to depart from his general declaration, and to enter into a specific detail of the different prohibitions, that specification will derogate from or govern the effect of the general terms already used, and be held as comprehend-

" The case of Prestonfield (14th January, 1812, Fac. Coll.) is less precisely in point, though in two respects it is even stronger than the present ; 1st, Because the defective enumeration occurs there in a second or supplementary joint irritant and resolute clause, following immediately upon certain special provisions (including that as to leases, which was there no question), and evidently intended mainly to secure their efficacy ; and, 2d, Because the enumeration itself is not, so far as it goes, in the full or precise terms of the original prohibitions (as is the case here), but is to a certain extent in the nature of a general reference, though containing the names of several of the acts that had been prohibited ; leases, however, not being of the number. The authority of the case of Tillicoultry was held, however, very clearly to extend to such a case."

Horne v.
 Rennie.

decided for Mr Horne and the heirs of entail—

The respondent assumes that the maker of the present entail professed forth in the irritant and resolute clauses, all the cases in which the penalty and forfeiture should operate, and holds it to be settled law that these clauses profess to contain a complete enumeration which in fact is defective, the entail is bad; but neither the clauses in question, nor the law as resulting from the decided cases, bear out this

The general reference in the resolute clause, though accompanyed by an enumeration of most of the prohibitions, is entirely independent of the subsequent specification, and the use of the term “particular” so far from limiting its operation, necessarily implies the existence of prohibitions not specified; there being no ground for a construction to the result, that the mere expression of a special or particular reference as to some of the prohibited acts, should be held as a total abandonment of the other; and the effect of the general reference remaining though the anxiety of the framer of the entail, as to some of the prohibitions, may have led him to superadd a specification of certain particulars falling within it; such a construction is besides excluded by a comparison of the general reference after the particular enumeration of the prohibited acts. The present question is not within the rule of the case of Tillicoultry, for there all the modes in which the heir could incur forfeiture were evidently intended to have been specifically set forth, and the general reference is qualified and restricted by the subsequent special enumeration; nor yet of the case of Prestonfield, in which the irritant contains no general reference to the antecedent provisions, farther than characterising those enumerated acts which are to be brought under the nullity, and is from its structure limited to those acts.

The cause was this day put out for advising.

JUSTICE-CLERK.—I entertain the same difficulty which was felt by the ordinary in distinguishing between the principle which ought to rule this case and that upon which the Tillicoultry case was decided. I am aware that the facts in that case and in the present are not exactly the same, the enumeration

No. 100. of particulars in which the prohibition against alienation is not included, I cannot but hold that there is a palpable defect in regard to that prohibition; and I do not feel myself warranted in going against the judgment of the Lord Ordinary.

19, 1857.
Lockhart v.
Macdonald.

LORD GLENLEE.—I have no idea of going against the Tillicoultry case, which is just to adhere to the principle of strict interpretation. We are not to begin with a lax interpretation of the words used, in order to bring the cases within the same category, and then resort to the doctrine of strict interpretation. By the use of the words “either” and “or,” as in the Tillicoultry case, the entailer expressly limits the resolution to the acts specified in the clause. In that case a great part of the argument was that the general clause applied to the prohibition omitted in the special enumeration; on that point the Court had differed. But here the case is perfectly different, as there is a general clause irritating the right by doing this or that. A general declaration in the resolute clause annexed to particulars will not apply to others of a different kind; but when it precedes them, then it bears “in case the heirs of tailzie shall contravene in any part of the premises,” and without prejudice to the generality, certain things are afterwards specified. So here, according to the strict meaning of the words, I cannot doubt that the entailer meant to irritate and resolve the heir’s right, if any one thing before prohibited was done. I incline, therefore, to alter the interlocutor, but in so doing I think I confirm the case of Tillicoultry.

LORD MEADOWBANK.—I agree entirely with the opinion of Lord Glenlee.

LORD MEDWYN.—I concur; and if I did not think I was following out the case of Tillicoultry, I should not be for altering.

THE COURT accordingly altered, and sustained the reasons of suspension, but found no expenses due.

MISSES MARY JANE LOCKHART MACDONALD, and EMILIA OLIVIA
LOCKHART MACDONALD, Defenders.—Keay.

Entail—Succession—Clause.—A party executed an entail, and granted procuratory to resign the estate for new infeftment, “to myself, and the heirs-male to be procreate of my body, of my present marriage, and the heirs whatsoever of the bodies of the said heirs-male; whom failing, to the heirs-male to be procreated of my body in any subsequent marriage, and the heirs whatsoever of the bodies of the said heirs-male; whom failing, to E. M., my only daughter, and the heirs-male of her body of her present marriage with C. L., and the heirs whatsoever of the body of the said heirs-male; whom failing, to the heirs-male of the said E. M. in any subsequent marriage, and the heirs whatsoever of the bodies of the said heirs-male; whom failing, to the heirs-female of the said E. M. of her present marriage:” E. M. took the estate, and was succeeded by a son and grandson, descending of the marriage with C. L.; the grandson died, leaving daughters:—Held, that these ladies were called to the succession before the younger brother of their father.

...or my only in any subsequent marriage, and the heirs what-of the bodies of the said heirs-male; whom failing, to Mrs Macdonald, my only lawful daughter, and the heirs-male of of her present marriage, and the heirs whatsoever of the body
d heirs-male; whom failing, to the heirs-male of the said Mrs Macdonald in any subsequent marriage, and the heirs what-of the bodies of the said heirs-male; whom failing, to the heirs-the said Mrs Elizabeth Macdonald of her present marriage;
ing, to such other heirs as I have nominate, or shall think pro-minate" by any writing; failing which nomination, then, "to st and lawful heirs-male whatsoever; which failing, to my assignees whomsoever."

Macdonald executed a deed of nomination, in which, among number of different families of the clan Macdonald were called, s deed of nomination, heirs-male of these several families were
ed. On the death of John Macdonald, his daughter, Mrs Lock-[acdonald, succeeded to the estate. On her death, her eldest s, succeeded, and died without issue. On his death, his brother-alexander succeeded, who again was succeeded by his eldest son who died, leaving two daughters, Misses Mary and Olivia Lock-donald, but no sons. A question arose between these ladies and er's brother, now Sir Norman Macdonald Lockhart, regarding ective rights of succession, under the destination of the Largie
There was a subordinate question also between the daughters
s. Three declarators of their respective claims were raised by eral parties, and were conjoined; but the action which was first of by the Court was the declarator at Sir Norman's instance, if he prevailed, there was no question left to determine between

No. 161. his heirs whomsoever," the destination to the heirs can only open, on the failure of the party himself, though the precedence of the party is not marked by inserting the words "whom failing" between him and his heirs, but, on the contrary, the word "and" is alone interposed between them. In such cases, the word "and," has the same legal effect as "whom failing," and it was so held in construing a similar clause in the destination of the Polwarth Peerage, when recently considered by a Committee of Privileges of the House of Peers.<sup>1</sup>

Jan. 19, 1887.
Lockhart v.
Macdonald.

The defenders answered. Even on the pursuer's construction, the heir whomsoever of the body of a son of Mrs Macdonald, by her first marriage, would have excluded her son by a second marriage, if she had entered into such second marriage. Accordingly her grand-daughter by a son of the first marriage, would have excluded her son by a subsequent marriage. But as all her sons, by any marriage, were equally near relations to her, it was difficult to discover any reason for preferring such grand-daughter to a son by the second marriage which was not equally strong for preferring her also to any younger son by the first marriage. And such was the plain intention of the entailer, which could not be lost sight of without leading to much incongruity in extricating the order of succession.

The Lord Ordinary reported the cause.

LORD GILLIES.—I think the question involved here is of much importance, but I do not consider it to be attended with any difficulty. The heir-male of the body of Mrs Macdonald by Mr Lockhart, was first called, and then the heir whomsoever of the body of that heir-male. I do not think that all the heirs-male of Mrs Macdonald's body, required to be exhausted, before the heir whomsoever of the body of any of these heirs-male was called. The defenders have put the proper construction on the destination, and they ought to be assoilzied from the declarator at Sir Norman's instance.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I am exactly of the same opinion. The deed does not appear to have been very accurately drawn, but the true construction is that which has now been stated. And I think the same, or a very similar clause in the destination of the Rothes estate, was so construed in the House of Lords.

LORD MACKENZIE.—I am of the same opinion. The descendants of every heir-male of the body of Mrs Macdonald are called before the collaterals or ascendants of such heir-male. I do not think the whole heirs-male of her body by the marriage with Mr Lockhart, were to be taken first, as one class, requiring to be completely exhausted, before the succession could open to the heir whomsoever of the body of any one of them. And had it been so, it might have been difficult to say, in such a case, who was to take, upon the failure of the last heir-male, whether it was the heir whomsoever of the first heir-male of the body of Mrs Macdonald or the heir whomsoever of the last. But besides, the destination, as construed by Sir Norman, would lead to results of great incongruity. It would first call nothing her class; then again, nothing but heirs whomsoever of their bodies, as ano- Craigie v.

 which is put upon the destination by the defenders is incomparably more probable than this. There is nothing in our style books or decisions to prevent the clause destination from being legally susceptible of their interpretation. And I am satisfied it is according to the true meaning and intention of the entailer.
 LORD BALGRAY was absent; but it was intimated by the Lord President that his Lordship concurred with the rest of the Court.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"The Lords having advised the three conjoined actions of declarator, find that the succession to the estate of Largie, under the deed of entail thereof, descends to the heirs whatsoever of the late Sir Charles Macdonald Lockhart, in preference to Sir Norman Macdonald Lockhart claiming as heir-male, and therefore sustain the defences to the action of declarator at his instance; assoilzie the defenders from the whole conclusions thereof, and decern; but reserve all questions between the daughters of the said Sir Charles Macdonald Lockhart relative to the said succession; and remit the processes of declarator at their instance to the Lord Ordinary, to proceed therein as shall be just."

 Craigie v.
 Hoggan.
 1st Division.
 Ld. Fullerton.
 D.

The defender alleged that the connexion was of an illicit nature.
 A record being made up, and a proof allowed, the following circumstances appeared. Hoggan had written a letter to the pursuer in these terms:—
 “DEAR ELIZABETH,—Under existing circumstances, I feel anxious to provide for you after my decease, as far as in my power; and with this view I shall, at my decease, leave a declaration, acknowledging you as my lawful wife, which will secure to you the annuity payable from the widows’ fund of writers to the signet. It is of the utmost importance that this intention should not be made known, as utter ruin, in that event, must fall on me; and were I to show or give you possession of the declaration,
 I would then be compelled to announce the fact to the collectors of the widows’ fund, within three months, under forfeiture of the annuity.
 The declaration, therefore, shall only be delivered at my decease, in the event of the most strict secrecy being adhered to regarding this communication; and I hereby declare, that in the event of the contents of this letter being made known to any other person or persons, except your father and mother, the letter shall be of no avail, and shall, in no manner of way, be held as binding, or used as a document against me or I am,” &c. This letter was dated, ex facie, January 25, 1834. The pursuer alleged that its true date was March 8, 1834, but that it was ante-dated for the purpose of legitimizing the child of which she was pregnant. Hoggan admitted that the letter was ante-dated, which he said was done at the pursuer’s request; and he did not recollect how long after its apparent date it was really written. He denied the alleged purpose of ante-dating it. The pursuer wrote a letter to Hoggan, which she alleged to have been dated March 8, 1834, and to have been in these terms:—“DEAR EDWARD,—I do hereby declare to take you for my lawful husband, in terms of the document which you have made out, and that I will not make it known to any but my father, mother, and those friends which I wish to be on terms of intimacy with.
 But should the fact become known, and I have no hand in it, I will not hold responsible nor forfeit my claim. I will do all to conceal it. Yours,” &c.
 Hoggan denied that he ever accepted, or retained such a letter; but he stated that he had received a letter from the pursuer, which he ultimately admitted to be of the import above quoted, which appeared to be given to a sinister purpose, and which he therefore instantly burnt in the No. 102.

 r's presence. The pursuer alleged that her father was ignorant of Jan. 19, 1837.
 sole transaction until 9th March, 1834, when it was communicated Craigie v.
 by her mother. The pursuer farther alleged that she afterwards Hoggan.
 ed a message to her father, by the defender's desire, stating that defender was willing to grant any written declaration of marriage might be desired, besides the letter of January 25th. This was l by the defender.

out the 25th of March the pursuer and her father took the opinion counsel as to the pursuer's legal claim to the status of a wife, and ed a favourable opinion.

e pursuer alleged that on 28th March her sister told Hoggan, her were not satisfied at the marriage being kept concealed, as the er might be rendered destitute by his going through the public cere-of marriage with another woman; and that next day Hoggan had red to her the following letter:—" March 29, 1834. DEAR ELI-TH,—It is most assuredly my intention to provide for you to the st extent my means will permit, during the remainder of your life, we are separate from each other. If I made any statement last night our sister to the contrary, it was not my intention. Whatever allow-is made is gratuitous on my part, and any abuse or attempt to comme to increase these payments, will be attended with a contrary
 t. I propose giving you £50 this year, in full of all expenses of tenance, payable at two terms, and the remaining years to be regu-l by circumstances. The doctor and nurse expenses to be paid.
 is, truly." In the first paragraph of this letter the words " while re separate from each other," originally were " while unmar-
 " The pursuer objected to these words, and the defender then k them out and inserted the others in their place. He stated that ad delivered this letter to her that she might shew it to her parents, d that the alteration in the letter was made to please her."

he pursuer alleged that on her now telling Hoggan that his reasons eeping the marriage private were unsatisfactory, he had consulted a d, and afterwards on 1st April, delivered to her the following letter tify her and her advisers:—" I hereby declare most solemnly before ighty God, that I never granted a letter to any one, such as I have to you, and cannot now grant any letter with such an obligation to her person, as I consider myself bound by my letter." The deof the letter was admitted.

e pursuer alleged that she had shown this letter, that night, to her who were resolved to have her marriage published, before her born, and who desired her to employ Robert White, W.S., as to get under the advice of the counsel already consulted as to her April 2, she employed White, who immediately wrote to him to solemnize the marriage, and at Hoggan's de-

No. 102. Jan. 10, 1837. Craigie v. Hoggan. sire, sent him copies of the letters and the case which had been laid before counsel. After much correspondence, and repeated recourse on both sides to the opinion of counsel, a summons of declarator of marriage was drawn by White and revised by counsel. On April 22, the pursuer went to the office of her agent White, and got up her letters and papers; she then went to Hoggan, who was waiting for her in the street, in the vicinity of White's office, and he called a hackney-coach, in which they were both driven straight to South Queensferry. The pursuer carried her whole papers in her reticule, and in the inn at South Queensferry she gave them all up to Hoggan. He looked over them, and it occurred to him that there might still be some papers in the hands of White; he therefore prepared the following draft of a mandate addressed to White, which the pursuer copied:—"SIR,—As Mr Hoggan and I have now arranged the matter, I withdraw all proceedings, and request you to deliver the whole papers, originals, copies, and drafts, still in your possession, connected with this business, to the bearer, who will settle your account. I am, sir, your obedient servant. (Signed) ELIZABETH CRAIGIE."

Hoggan at this time wrote a note, addressed to the pursuer, and put it into her hands. Her mandate was sent immediately by Hoggan to his friend in Edinburgh, who called and got up all the papers from White, which it referred, and at the same time, paid his business account. In the mean time Hoggan put back into the pursuer's reticule, those papers which she had with her, and they crossed the Forth in the afternoon to North Queensferry, where they slept, at a respectable inn, in the same bed. Next forenoon they drove to Burntisland and dined there. After dinner, Hoggan again took the papers out of the reticule, looked them over, and then threw into the fire the letters of 25th January, 29th March, and 1st April, and also the summons of declarator. Next day the parties returned across the Forth to Newhaven.

In regard to the destroying of these papers the parties were directly at issue whether it was done with the pursuer's consent or not, and whether none but the papers above enumerated were destroyed. They were also at issue respecting the contents of the note delivered by Hoggan to the pursuer on first getting possession of the papers at South Queensferry. He averred that it merely contained a provision, for life, settling on the pursuer: She averred it contained an explicit acknowledgment of her as his wife, and that it was destroyed by him along with the other papers at Burntisland. After this the parties lived together for some time, in various places, and about May 1st, at a time when Hoggan had taken the pursuer to Glasgow and left her there, he wrote a letter from Dumfries enclosing a letter from the pursuer's mother to the pursuer, and after mentioning that his Edinburgh friend, formerly noticed, had informed him that the pursuer's sister had written to his (defender's) sister, "communicating the whole of our intimacy;" he added that he enclosed a bundle from the pursuer's mother to her, which had been forwarded to him by his friend. He added, "Your own sense and feelings must guide you to answer the letter enclosed. I think you ought merely to state whether you feel yourself comfortable or not;—your determination of not seeing them for some length of time, and that your present absence is from your own choice, with my approbation."

Craigie v.
Hoggan.

In the month of August, Hoggan took a house in Warriston Crescent, and, while it was in preparation he wrote this note to the pursuer's mother:—"Mrs Craigie will receive herewith the keys of a flat in No. 4, Warriston Crescent. It will be obliging if Mrs C. will give the enclosed £2 to the servant to purchase coals, and other materials requisite for cleaning the house."

The pursuer alleged that Hoggan then took her to that house as his home, and introduced her to the servants as his wife, on which occasion her mother was in the house. Shortly afterwards the pursuer returned to her mother's house, alleging that Hoggan's conduct had rendered this necessary, and she raised her declarator.

In the course of the proof, the pursuer tendered as a witness Robert White, W.S., who had acted as her agent in the manner already mentioned, but who had not been employed at all in reference to the present process. An objection on the ground of agency was taken, after examining him in initialibus, and the Commissary directed his deposition to be sealed up.

Parties were heard before the Lord Ordinary on the right of the pursuer to open up the sealed deposition.

The pursuer pleaded, that, as White was not agent in this cause, he was admissible, leaving his credibility to be observed upon, in respect of his prior agency. And, as the pursuer was entitled, in support of her present action, to prove the nature of his previous employment, and his actings under it, all which was of essential importance to her, White was the best witness to prove this.

The defender answered—

White was the pursuer's agent in a cause which had the same conclusions as the present, and in which every plea that was set forth was equally set forth in this action. The objection of agency therefore applied, although a new summons had been raised and a new agent was employed, and some additional facts were founded on. White still had acted as agent regarding what was the subject-matter of the present action. The Lord Ordinary repelled the objection to the examination of Mr White, and ordered his sealed deposition to be opened up. In this judgment the defender acquiesced.

Upon opening up the deposition, it appeared that he had been asked by the pursuer, in reference to her getting up the letters and papers out of his hands on 22d April, "On what ground, and for what purpose, the defender requested him to give her up the documents?"

No. 102. The defender objected that the question was incompetent, and the Commissary sustained the objection.

Jan. 19, 1837.
Draigie v.
Loggan.

The pursuer then asked, "On what ground, and for what purpose did he (White) so give the documents to the pursuer?"

To which the defender objected that it was just, in substance, the first question in another shape, and was equally incompetent.

The Commissary sustained the objection.

The pursuer's right to put these questions, and also his right to have the sealed depositions of the pursuer's father and sister opened up, which had been allowed to be taken to lie in retentis,* was now argued, in minutes of debate, before the Lord Ordinary.

* NOTE by the Lord Ordinary to the interlocutor directing the deposition of the pursuer's father and sister to be taken, and to lie in retentis.

"Had the form of procedure been so peremptory as to oblige the Lord Ordinary instantly to decide the point in dispute, he would have been disposed to find, that in the special circumstances of this case, these witnesses were not inadmissible. The rule against the admission of near relations is not absolute. It confessedly suffers one exception, that arising from penuria testium; and in the latest case which occurred, that of Stewart v. Menzies, and in which the objection was sustained, it seems to have been admitted by the Court, that even there, circumstances might emerge in the course of the proof which would ultimately warrant a recourse to the testimony of the rejected witnesses. Now here, and even with the information at present afforded by the admissions of the defender, there are very strong grounds for holding that there is a penuria, and that too, imputable to the defender himself. It is admitted by him, that between the 8th March and 1st of April, 1834, inclusive, certain letters, of which the contents are also admitted, were addressed by the defender to the pursuer. The true import and object of these letters, form one of the principal subjects of averment and denial on the record. The first of these letters expressly cautions the pursuer to keep the contents strictly secret, except from her father and mother. It is not denied that the parties were living in the same family, and that negotiations or conversations were taking place in regard to the subject of the letters; and indeed, in the defender's letter of the 9th of March, of which the copy is admitted, he refers to a 'statement made last night to your sister.' In addition, it must be considered that he admits that one very important letter—that of the 8th March, 1834, from the pursuer to him—was by him thrown into the fire; though he adds, this was done in her presence. Whatever may be the truth of that statement, the fact is, the letter was destroyed by him; and he does not admit the accuracy of the copy kept and produced by the pursuer.<sup>1</sup> And again, he admits that at a later period he got possession of and destroyed a number of papers, of which neither the description nor the contents can now easily be identified. In these circumstances there does seem to be a strong case on the part of the pursuer for dispensing with the general rule, and for allowing the examination of the proposed witnesses on those points (such as the negotiations and communications connected with the above-mentioned correspondence, &c.), on which they alone can possess any information.

"The Lord Ordinary however is perfectly sensible, as the Court seem to have been in the case of Stewart v. Menzies, that in the course of the proof, circumstances may arise capable of affecting very materially the question of the admis-

<sup>1</sup> It was at a subsequent stage that the admission, already mentioned in the narrative of the report, was made.

In reference to the depositions of her father and sister, the pursuer No. 105 pleaded—

1. The circumstances of the case were extremely peculiar. Hoggan's letter, dated 25th January, while enjoining the strictest secrecy as to other persons, allowed its contents to be communicated to the pursuer's father and mother: and that letter promised to make the pursuer his widow, at his decease. Hoggan's letter of 29th March, in reference to a provision for life on the pursuer, referred to a "statement last night to her sister," regarding this subject, which showed that he had been communing with the sister as to their intimacy, and the footing on which they stood towards each other. In these peculiar circumstances, as the defender himself had done so much to render the pursuer's relations necessary witnesses, he was barred from pleading the general rule against their admissibility. But besides this he had wilfully destroyed many of the documents founded on by the pursuer, and, though he admitted the accuracy of copies of several of these, he denied the import of the important note of 22d April, which he gave to the pursuer on getting up the papers. As his own improper act had thus narrowed the pursuer's means of proof, she was entitled to peculiar favour in pleading penuria testium as a ground for admitting her relations. And they might the more safely be admitted, being called to prove, not an isolated contract, or mere exchange of matrimonial consent, but facts and circumstances which formed part of a train of proceedings, and as to the truth of which there thus existed various collateral checks. The later authorities, including that of Stewart, recognized the admissibility of such testimony in cases where the circumstances warranted it: and this was such a case.<sup>1</sup>

2. In reference to the questions put to White, the pursuer pleaded, that they ought to have been allowed. Any statement made by the pursuer to her agent as to the object or purpose of getting up her papers, being made at the time, and when the defender was waiting for her in the street, was part of the res gesta, and should be put in proof before the Court; especially considering that the defender denied what she alleged to have been the true import of the note which he gave her, on that same day, at the time of getting her papers from her.

of these witnesses; and as the forms of Court afford the means of obtaining additional light on the subject, without any risk of the loss of evidence to the pursuer, he has thought it his duty, in a question of such delicacy and difficulty, to avail himself of these forms on the present occasion."

10. 102. The defender answered:—
 1. By the general rule of law, relations of nearness are excluded in every civil case, even where the most important interest was at stake, because it was feared they were too much identified with the party to bear true and trustworthy testimony. But in such a case as this, where the fame and status of a daughter or sister was at stake, the rule was peculiarly applicable, because the temptation to suppress or distort facts, and to give false testimony, would generally be found too strong for human nature to resist. And such accordingly had been the distrust expressed felt by the Court, regarding such testimony, in the most authoritative judgments on the subject.<sup>1</sup> Besides, the exception of penuria testium never applied where such penuria was imputable in any degree to the party pleading the exception; and as the alleged transaction could neither have been clandestine or irregular without the pursuer's concurrence, she could not now avail herself of that irregularity as a means of letting in suspicious testimony, which must have been inadmissible if nothing had been clandestine. The defender's admission was the sole proof of his having destroyed any of the documents, and it was qualified by the statement that the pursuer had consented to this. And besides, he had admitted the copies of almost all the documents.

2. It was incompetent for the pursuer to put in proof against the defender any mere statement of her own to her agent, which was not made in his, the defender's, presence, even supposing that it could be proved by testimony which was wholly free from suspicion, which that of White was not.

The Lord Ordinary, "in respect of the special circumstances of this case, as established by the documents in process, and the proof already taken, repelled the objections offered by the defender to the admissibility of the pursuer's father and sister as witnesses; and also repelled the objection to the question put to the witness, Robert White, and appointed the sealed packets referred to in the minutes to be opened, and to form part of the process." *

* "NOTE.—The Lord Ordinary, upon again considering the objection to the examination of the pursuer's father and sister, is rather confirmed than otherwise in the opinion expressed in his former note. The general rule unquestionably is that witnesses so circumstanced must be rejected; and the Lord Ordinary fully concurs in the opinion, that actions like the present do not necessarily demand an relaxation of that rule. When a pursuer founds upon an alleged private and irregular marriage, it would be most dangerous to permit her to urge as a matter of right the secrecy of the transaction, as in itself a sufficient ground for obtaining the testimony of her near relations, the very persons who have the strongest motive for colouring or perverting the truth; and who, on the supposition of her own

Hoggan reclaimed, and, inter alia, objected, that the note of the Lord Ordinary, indicated an intention of not only admitting the pursuer's father and sister, but also allowing a line of examination to be pursued, which

ments being unfounded, are presumably the very persons with whose assistance the measures of the pursuer have been contrived. But the rule is not without exception. Even in the latest case, mainly founded on by the defender, that of Smart v. Menzies, the Court, in expressing their opinions, took for granted, that circumstances might emerge in the course of the proof, warranting the examination of the witnesses objected to, on the ground of relationship; and accordingly, on the strength of such circumstances, a brother of the pursuer was afterwards examined.

"Now, it does appear to the Lord Ordinary, that the present case falls within the exception.

"It is established by the documents in process, at least by copies of which the accuracy is admitted, that the defender did address several letters to the pursuer, which, to say the least of them, are of a very equivocal character. Independently of the sense attached to them by the defender, by profession a man of business, the construction put upon them by the pursuer, the comparatively inexperienced individual to whom they were addressed, especially if that construction was known to the defender, is a point which may be of very great importance. In this view, it is essential to ascertain the whole circumstances relative to the acceptance by the defender of the pursuer's letter of the 8th of March, the terms of which are, for the first time, admitted in the minute. The defender, in his deposition as a haver, admits that he received that letter and burnt it; but the addition to that testimony that it was so burned in the presence of, and with the consent of the pursuer, is clearly not conclusive evidence. The only information attainable upon all those matters, is to be sought for in the examination of the pursuer's nearest relations, to whom, by the most positive injunctions of the defender himself, the pursuer's confidence was to be confined. In these circumstances, it does appear to the Lord Ordinary, that their testimony cannot be rejected, without the greatest injury to the pursuer; while, on the other hand, the defender has, by his own acts, placed himself in a situation, most justly barring all attempts on his part to shut out the only light which can be obtained on the subject. In canvassing the weight due to the testimony of those witnesses, regard will of course be had to the peculiarity of their situation, but in the mean time the Lord Ordinary cannot refuse their testimony.

"The second point relates to the question put to Mr Whyte, as to the pursuer's reasons for asking from him the letters and documents; or, as the question is put in another form, his reason for re-delivering them. In general, a statement made by a party would be inadmissible; but this is not exactly a fair mode of stating the point. It is admitted that those papers and documents were got up from Mr Whyte by the pursuer, for the purpose of being delivered to the defender, who was waiting in the neighbourhood of Mr Whyte's office. It is admitted by the defender, that the delivery of those documents to him was not gratuitous or unconditional. He avers, that the condition was, the conveyance to her of a provision for life; while the pursuer avers it to have been the granting of a letter explicitly declaring her to be his wife, and thus superseding the necessity of the first action of declarator, and of the various documents on which it was founded.

"Both parties aver, that a letter was written, binding the defender to the condition, such as it was. That letter is not forthcoming. The defender has not admitted the pursuer as a haver, and on the other hand she states, that it was along with the other documents, which the defender admits he put into the hands of the pursuer; and in the absence of any proof of its existence, there does not seem to be some probability in this statement. The parties then being at issue in regard to the condition on which these papers and documents were to be delivered

No. 102. might involve many individual questions of the utmost delicacy, in point of competency, and as to which he ought not to be now prejudged. He therefore moved the Court to alter, or at least to insert a reservation if they adhered.

LORD GILLIES.—I think the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary is well founded in the special circumstances of this case, and that the reasoning in the note sufficiently supports the interlocutor. But, in adhering, I think nothing should be decided as to the father and sister of the pursuer, except that they are admissible witnesses. The interlocutor finds nothing more than this, and neither do we, if we merely adhere, as I think we should.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I quite concur in adhering to the interlocutor. The general rule as to the inadmissibility of so near relations as these witnesses is perfectly fixed, but it suffers exception in special cases, and the circumstances of this case are very peculiar indeed: The defender's own conduct lets in these witnesses. In adhering, however, it is very proper to observe that we only determine the point of the admissibility of these witnesses. The particular questions which may be put to them are not now before us, and it would be premature to foreclose either party now, on the competency of any of these questions. But it is unnecessary to insert any reservation, on this subject, in our interlocutor, as we merely decide that the witnesses are admissible.

LORD MACKENZIE.—I am very suspicious of testimony like this, in ordinary cases, but the circumstances of this case are of the most special and peculiar character. It is admitted that there was a treaty between the pursuer and defender, to which treaty the pursuer's parents were parties. The defender gives a very odd account of this treaty, when he says that the object of it was to make the pursuer his widow, without making her his wife. Making her his widow must imply that he first made her his wife, for, assuredly, if no marriage existed before he was dead, it could not begin afterwards. Our judicial records do bear evidence, it is true, that there have been times when the bodies of traitors, after they were deceased, have been brought into Court, and that a trial has been held, and sentence pronounced and executed on them; but I never heard of any form, at any time, by which a marriage-contract was held to be entered into with a corpse. Yet this would be the only way of making a woman the widow of a man who died before she became his wife. It is, therefore, a very odd account which the defender gives of this treaty with the pursuer. And, in addition to this, he has destroyed a number of the letters and papers which were calculated to throw light upon it; in which proceeding, I cannot perceive that he was actuated by any motive but the wish to destroy evidence. Then it appears that the pursuer's father and sister have knowledge in reference to the very matters which the defender has tried thus to conceal. He permitted the pursuer to make communications on the subject, to her parents, while he enjoined the strictest secrecy towards others, and he was him-up, it rather appears to the Lord Ordinary that the expressions used by the pursuer to her agent, on asking for the papers, while the defender was waiting on the street to receive them, fall to be considered as part of the res gesta; as a circumstance taking place in the course of the transaction, which may be competently received."

self a party to a conversation with the sister respecting these matters. In these very unusual and remarkable circumstances, I think that the pursuer's father and sister cannot be objected to by him as inadmissible, but ought to be examined. In regard also to the question put to White, I concur with the Lord Ordinary, and have nothing to add to his Lordship's observations on that point.

GLASGOW COMMISSIONERS of POLICE, Defenders and Respondents.—
Rutherford—G. Napier.

Title to Pursue.—Commissioners under a Burgh Police Act having authorized the payment of a certain sum out of the funds under their management in liquidation of the expenses of opposing a bill in Parliament, and having imposed an assessment for the current year, proceeding on consideration of an estimate of the expenses of the preceding year, in which this sum was included, and certain rate-payers having brought an action for setting aside the resolutions of the Commissioners as in violation of the statute, and for having them ordained to pay back the sums so voted away by them into the funds of the police establishment, and also to have them interdicted from including these sums in any assessment to be imposed or levied by them—Held that the pursuers had no such direct or immediate interest as to entitle them to insist in these conclusions.

By the police act of the city of Glasgow, passed in 1821, a Board of Commissioners are appointed for the management of the whole matters embraced by the act, with power to levy an assessment on the inhabitants, which, with certain other funds forming part of the revenues of the Board, it is enacted shall be applied to the purposes specified in the act, "and for no other purposes whatever;" and any surplus in one year is directed to be applied to the same purposes in the next year. After some provisions (§§ 123-4-5) as to proceedings for recovery of fines and penalties, &c., and for an appeal to the Circuit Court of Justiciary, it is enacted (§ 133) "That no action shall be commenced against the said magistrates and other commissioners, or any other person or persons, for any thing done in the execution of this act, after three calendar months from the time the act is committed; and the defender or defenders in such action or process may produce this act, and plead that the said things were done by authority, and in virtue thereof; and if they shall appear to be done, then and in that case the said defender or defenders shall be absolved from such action or process, and the pursuer or pursuers in such action shall be found liable to pay the said defender or defenders, the expenses of process incurred by the said defender or defenders: and it is always, that it shall be competent to the Town-Council, Mer-

In the year 1834, a bill having been introduced into Parliament for the union of two water companies which had for some time subsisted in Glasgow, containing powers that were considered injurious to the public interests, as creating a monopoly of the supply of water, on unduly advantageous terms to the promoters of it, considerable opposition was raised by various classes of the inhabitants and several public bodies in the city. Joint measures were taken to resist the passing of the bill, for which purpose a deputation was sent to London by the opponents of the scheme. Among other bodies, the Commissioners of Police co-operated in these measures. On the 6th February, 1834, a meeting of the Board passed a series of resolutions condemnatory of the bill, and agreeing to petition Parliament against it; and a subsequent meeting on the 13th resolved by a majority of 21 to 4, "that the committee be authorized to co-operate with other public bodies in giving effect to the resolutions of the Board, by opposing the proposed monopoly in the supply of water, and to contribute a proportional expense of the opposition."

Against this resolution two of the minority entered their protest. The bill was successfully opposed, an expense being incurred, amounting in all to £857, 19s. 2d. At a meeting of the Board held on the 17th July, accounts were laid before them, in which there was an item, under the head of incidental charges, of £47, 7s., for "opposing the water bill in part. The following report by the Committee of Finance was at the same time laid before the meeting:—"There was laid before the committee, copy minute of meeting of the joint committees from the public bodies for opposing the water bill, containing a statement of the expenses, incurred in the opposition. The total amount is £2065, 18s. 5d., of which the proportion claimed from the police establishment, is £857, 19s. 2d.; but it is supposed that some deductions from the accounts may be obtained, and the police establishment will be entitled to one-half the benefit of whatever deductions may be made. The whole accounts are in the hands of the clerk, for the inspection of all concerned; and the committee recommend, in the meantime, an interim grant of £600 to account, as that much has already been advanced by the city incorporation."

The meeting approved of the accounts containing the item of £47, 7s., and directed the consideration of the report to stand over till next meeting.

ing. At the next meeting, held on the 24th July, the Board having "considered the report of the committee of finance upon the expenses of the opposition to the water bill," it was moved and carried "that as therein proposed the board do now order payment of £600 of these expenses;"
and at a subsequent meeting on the 25th August, "the board having considered the estimate of income and expenditure presented at last meeting, and which is herein below engrossed, approved thereof, and now laid on an assessment for the current year, at the rate of one shilling per pound on the highest class of rents, and at lower rates on lower rents, in terms of the statute."

In the estimate here referred to, there was included among the items of expenditure the sum of £810 for "opposing the Water Company's bill."
On the 13th of October following, the pursuers, Ewing and others, seventeen in number, and designing themselves "residents in Glasgow, or occupiers of property there, and rated in the police books as liable in payment of police assessments under the police act after mentioned, and who have hitherto been assessed accordingly, for themselves, and for all those who adhere to them, and whose names and designations will be specified in a minute in the proceedings that may follow hereon," presented a bill of suspension and interdict, narrating the resolutions of 17th and 24th July, and 25th August above recited, and the provisions of the police act, in contravention of which they alleged this application of the funds to have been made, and praying to have the commissioners prohibited and interdicted. "Primo, From appropriating or applying, directly

The bill of suspension having been passed and the letters expedite, the two actions were conjoined and a record made up, in which the commissioners of police maintained a variety of pleas both on the merits and on the title of the pursuers to pursue. With reference to these the Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor, adding the subjoined note :—"Sustains the title of the pursuers; repels the objection to the

* "None of the principles or authorities about popular actions apply to this case. There can scarcely be conceived to be a better title and interest than that which a person who is taxed illegally has to resist that tax, at least in so far as relates to his portion of it. The 133d section of the statute confers a right of action on certain public bodies. But giving these a statutory title, does not take away any title belonging by law to individuals. And even as to these bodies, their right is confined to cases affecting the misapplication of funds vested in the commissioners, whereas part of the objection here is, that the defenders went beyond their powers, and assessed for sums, which, for this reason, could not be legally vested in them.

"Section 124 makes an appeal to the Circuit Court lawful; but the clause plainly does not apply to questions like this; and, at any rate, the ordinary jurisdiction of the Court of Session to protect against excess of power, is not taken away. The two sections which precede, and which follow this one, make it clear that the 124th only applies to proceedings in which the person aggrieved was judicially a party.

"Section 133 limits actions for things done 'in execution of this act' to three months, but this does not apply to cases where the complaint is that the defenders went out of the act; and besides, the act specially challenged took place on the 17th and on the 24th of July, and the action was raised on the 13th October. There were resolutions, no doubt, of February before, to do these acts, which prospective resolutions are not brought under reduction. But it was unnecessary for the pursuers to challenge, not merely the act which injured them, but all the votes by which it may have been preceded. If it were, every act might be saved from objection, by being preceded by a resolution above three months before, which, in itself, may do no harm, and of which the party hurt may never hear. In this very case, it does not appear how there was any personal interest in any body to interfere, for nothing actually touching any individual was done. There was merely a barren, general and revocable resolution that at some future time an unnamed proportion of the expense would be paid.

"On the merits, the Lord Ordinary has abstained from deciding anything at jurisdiction of the Court of Session. Finds that the action is not cut off No. 108 by the statutory limitation of three months: Finds that the defenders had no right to levy or apply the sums in question, or any part thereof, in present except the first conclusion of the reduction, because the other matters cannot very well be extricated till the general principle be fixed; and if his view of this principle be wrong, it is needless to compel the parties to go minutely into the rest of the case.

"He is not moved in deciding the reductive conclusion by any considerations of expediency. He goes upon the statute alone, and his general opinion is, that the defenders, as police commissioners, have no particle of power except what they can show that they possess in virtue of the act of Parliament which creates them, and that he cannot discover, by any legal reading or construction of that act, that they are authorized to assess for the purpose of opposing or of advancing any Parliamentary bill whatever.

"The case of the defenders rests on the averments that the bill in question was hurtful to the inhabitants, and interfered with the existing Police Act, and that, without their official co-operation, could not have been defeated. It is, and always must be, one of the misfortunes of permitting such applications of the funds, that any court, in judging of their propriety, must consider the truth of such averment, and that these are scarcely capable of being judicially ascertained. It appears from this process, that there are persons in Glasgow who hold that the bill was of a beneficial tendency for the people—that any obnoxious clauses might have been given up or arranged—that it could have been thrown out without the defenders' help—and that, at any rate, their expenditure in obstructing it was extravagant. If the defenders are not to get unlimited credit, these points must be laid before the propriety of what they did can be determined by this Court; and how they are to be determined the Lord Ordinary does not know. They are, to a great extent, matters of mere opinion. However, he assumes, in argument, that they are all clear in the defenders' favour. Still, he cannot discover that legislation was any part of the Commissioners' business, at least at the expense of the police funds.

"The general import of the statute is, that the Commissioners are to keep up a proper establishment of officers, and are to see that the city be watched, cleaned, and lighted, and that they may levy funds for the purposes herein directed, 'and for the other necessary purposes of this act, and for no other purposes whatever.' This gives them ample authority to do any thing, such as even raising or defending actions necessary for the fulfilment of these objects. But, in opposing bills in Parliament one of them? If the new bill contained clauses injurious to the public, and repugnant to the existing Police Act, this may have excited the public to resist; but what part of the act says or implies that the Commissioners may not only enact for administering the statute, but for perpetuating all its parts by obstructing Parliamentary change? If a bill were to be introduced for repealing the Police Act, or for altogether abolishing the police, the Lord Ordinary has no idea that such an extreme proposal could be lawfully opposed at the expense of the ordinary funds. The Commissioners had no property in the police funds or privileges so as to be entitled, like many other public trustees, to take all measures calculated to maintain or to extend their interests. They were the mere official servants of the public under this single and temporary act, so that their preventing change of the statute could never be part of their implied duty of putting the statute as it stood into execution. If such a power was meant to be conferred, it would how it was not mentioned, especially as minuteness is the principle on which the statute is constructed. There are about 50 or 60 sections, specifying what the Commissioners may do. They are not even allowed to fill up dangerous holes in the street without a clause. It is difficult to believe that, amidst such jealous restrictions, it was intended that so peculiar and irresponsible a power as that of

e pursuers, on the other hand, pleaded—

The limitation in the 133d section does not apply to actions of this kind founded on matters done, not in execution of the Act, but in connection of it; but, besides, the wrong done to the pursuers was not by abolition in February, but by those in July and August, whereby they could be affected, by including the sums in question in the amount to be levied from them.

Glasgow Commissioners of Police v.
Glasgow Commissioners of Police.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—Your Lordships are aware, that, independent of the question on the merits, there is a very important question on the objection to the title, which I think is deserving of grave and impartial consideration. The pursuers describe themselves as “all residenters in Glasgow, or occupiers of property there, and rated in the police books as liable in payments of police assessments under the Police Act after-mentioned, and who have hitherto been assessed accordingly,” and add that they appear “for themselves, and for all those who adhere to them, and whose names and designations will be specified in a Minute in the proceedings which may follow hereon.” Then it is important to look to the nature of the conclusions in the reduction, and to the interdict. The pursuers conclude for reduction of the minutes specified, and that the individual Commissioners who attended the meetings be decerned “to repeat and pay back, or to procure repeated and paid back, into the funds of the said police establishment, the foresaid sum of £600, which they illegally and wrongfully authorised, sanctioned, and ordered to be paid away out of the said funds, as before-mentioned, for the purpose of defraying the expense, in part, of opposing the said Water Company’s bill, to the effect that the said funds, belonging to the said police establishment, may be in the same state as if the said resolutions had not been passed, and the foresaid sums had not been paid away.” Now it is plain there is no direct or indirect conclusion for payment or repetition to any one of these pursuers. It may be said they have an indirect or remote interest to have the funds restored. But there is no conclusion for repayment to any of these parties. It is not stated that a higher rate has been laid on them which ought to be repeated, and there is no patrimonial interest brought into view. Then is there such an interest set forth as to warrant our sustaining their title to insist in these conclusions? This would certainly have deserved grave consideration, if it could have been shown that, but for such an action, there could have been no redress otherwise. A very strong case of misapplication of funds might be imagined, but then the 133d section provides, that it is competent to the Town-Council of the city—to the Merchants’ House and to the Trades’ House, within 12 months of the wrong done, to bring an action against the Commissioners for embezzling and squandering, or misapplying the funds. The improper application of funds raised, or an undue assessment made for wrongful purposes, would come under the terms misapplying, and the Commissioners would be liable to a suit at the instance of any of these bodies. Here there is a complete remedy for any wrong. I lay no stress on the limitation of three months, which applies to another class of cases, but under this 133d section there is a complete answer to the plea, that there is no remedy if an action like this be not sustained. Then we are driven to their title at common law. It is settled law, that no party can conclude for behoof of a community, or general body of individuals not incorporated. This point was clearly decided in the case of Lauder. Then can they maintain it on individual interests? I cannot doubt that the principles of the case of Inverury are applicable here, and that the individual interest rested on will not afford a title for such actions. The decision in that case was rested on the ground, that there was no direct interest, as the acts complained of were not in prejudice of the pursuers themselves individually, but only to the prejudice of the burgh funds; and, though so far indirectly affected, that was not held to afford a sufficient interest. The principle there given effect to is not a rule applicable to burghs only, but a general rule, that a party must set forth a and immediate interest. It may be that the pursuers could have framed No. 103.

 summons differently ; but we must take it as it is, and the principle applies.

 action as laid.

D MEDWYN.—It strikes me in the same light, and so I am not called on to the merits farther than to see what the conclusions are in which the pursist. They set forth that they are rated in the police books, and have assessed. That is their title, and they conclude for reduction of the minutes, repetition, where the only interest can lie ; but repetition is concluded for the pursuers, but into the fund, and there is no conclusion as to the individually interests of these parties. There are various clauses of the Police Act referred to on both sides, which do not appear to me to bear on this question. Section 30 does not apply at all, as it refers to the sort of cases mentioned in the pre-clause. As little does sec. 31 apply. I agree with the Lord Ordinary that the pursuers may object to an illegal tax so far as regards their own portion of it.
 The pursuers do not raise the question here as to the tax on themselves.
 They have no interest but their own. They cannot appear for the community or as rate payers—they are only to be looked on as seventeen individuals for their own interest ; but they do not seek repetition to themselves, but into the fund.
 Their right benefit by next year's assessment being less, but that is just the sort of direct interest which does not give a title to persons of a class having common interests. This is not a question of levying, but of misapplying funds levied for other purpose ; and the levy for next year is not objected to. It falls, therefore, under sec. 133, which gives right to certain bodies to call the Commissioners to account, and the clause is just put in to meet the difficulty arising from the want of interest on the part of individuals, except to the extent of their own assessment, which is too trifling to ensure a check. Also the Board of Commissioners at any time being might sue their predecessors. I am therefore satisfied this supplies any difficulty. Consequently, it is unnecessary to enter upon the merits, as there are no proper parties before us, and we must sustain the objection to the title.

THE COURT accordingly altered, sustained the objection to the title, and dismissed the action.

No. 20, 1837. John Dundas, clerk to the signet, presented a petition stating, that in consequence of the recent demise of James, Earl of Rosslyn, the office which his Lordship had held, of Director of his Majesty's Chancery in Scotland, fell to be regulated by the provisions of 57, Geo. III. c. 64; that no appointment had yet been made under this act, in relation to the office of Director, and that it was necessary for the conduct of public business that an interim appointment of a Director in Chancery should be immediately made; that he, the petitioner, had held the office of Deputy-director since 1831, under the deceased Earl, and that in 1830, his Lordship had granted an appointment to Lord Loughborough, now Earl of Rosslyn, and to the petitioner, jointly and severally during their joint lives, and the life of the survivor of them, to be clerks of Chancery. The petitioner prayed the Court "to nominate and appoint him to be Director of his Majesty's Chancery in that part of Great Britain called Scotland, ad interim only, and until such time as the place of the said Earl shall be supplied, and the duties of the office provided for, in terms of the said Act of Parliament; with the same rights, powers, and privileges as those enjoyed by the said deceased James Earl of Rosslyn; and particularly with power to appoint substitutes to act for him during the subsistence of the interim appointment to follow hereon."

THE COURT, without ordering any intimation, granted the prayer of the petition, and directed the petition and their deliverance to be recorded in the Books of Sederunt.

WILLIAM COWAN, Claimant.—Cowan.
MRS JANE RONALD CRAWFORD, Claimant.—Whigham.
WILLIAM CRAWFORD, Claimant.—McNeill.

Trust—Testament—Vesting.—1. A trust held not to have been vacated by the death of one trustee, the departure of another from the country, and the bankruptcy of the remaining trustee, though a curator bonis had been thereafter appointed by the Court at the instance of parties beneficially interested. 2. Circumstances in which held that certain provisions only vested subject to a power conferred on trustees of regulating their investment and destination; and that the power, though for a long time neglected to be exercised, had not become inoperative.

11 The deed contained the usual power to appoint factors and to and dispose of the trust subjects. The purposes of the trust were, the payment of debts and expenses.

The investment of funds to provide an annuity of £40 in favour of the truster's wife, and of a sum of £200 for her behoof in liferent, and to the use of the truster's children or grandchildren in fee as she might nominate, failing which nomination, the trustees were to hold this sum in or for the use of certain of the grandchildren.

The investment of a provision of £4000 for behoof of two granddaughters, failing whom, it was to return to the trustees for the use of the truster's grandchildren in life.

A provision of £50 to a certain grandchild.

The 5th purpose was as follows:—"I hereby ordain and appoint the free residue or remainder of my estate, real and personal, after discharging the before-mentioned burdens and provisions, to be divided into four equal shares, as soon after my decease as circumstances will permit; and that being done, I authorize, ordain, and appoint my said executor or trustee to lay out and invest on undoubted security, one of the four shares for the use and behoof of my son, the said Charles, in liferent, for his liferent use only, and to his children lawfully begotten or to be procreated, and in fee at his death, in fee, equally amongst them, share and share alike; declaring always, and hereby providing, that the part or share falling to each of the children of the said Charles Angus shall remain under the care and management of my said executor or trustee, until said children shall respectively attain the age of twenty-one years complete, or be married with the approbation of the majority of my said trustees then acting, and to whom I hereby grant and

No. 105. In the event the said Janet Hornell (one of the children), who is appointed of John Nish in Edinburgh, shall survive me, and be then in life, that her share, in virtue hereof, shall be laid out and invested on undoubted security by my said trustees or trustee for her use and behoof in herent, for her life only, during all the days of her lifetime, and for that of her children lawfully procreated or to be procreated, in life at the time of her death, and their executors, in fee, under the express stipulation that the said John Nish, her husband, shall have no interest or concern in her said interest; hereby expressly excluding his jus mariti and powers of administration; and declaring that no debts or debts of the said John Nish, her husband, shall anyways affect or burden her said interest, but that the same shall remain to her an alimentary fund, free of all impositions. And the deed further declared, that my said trustees or trustee shall take charge of the interest of the children of the said Janet Hornell, whether she survives or predeceases me, in the same manner as I have appointed them to take charge of that of the children of the said Charles Angus; and I hereby commit to them similar powers to secure and establish the interests of the said Janet Hornell, that their shares may be equally useful and beneficial to each of them. The remaining share of the residue was to be paid to the truster's daughter, Jane Biggam, &c.

It was further provided, that all and every sum or sums which shall in virtue hereof lapse and return to my said trustees or trustee, during the continuance of this trust, shall pertain and belong to my lawful grandchildren then in life, share and share alike; and to that effect I hereby convey and make over the same to them and their executors accordingly, on the same conditions and stipulations annexed to the other provisions before written conceived in their favour; and generally, I provide and declare that my said acting trustees or trustee shall have the full power and option, in all cases which may occur respecting my said grandchildren, either to make to them respectively unconditional payments of what shall arise to them in virtue hereof, on their respectively attaining the age of twenty-one years complete, or being married with approbation foresaid, or then to settle and establish the same upon each of them, and their heirs and executors, with and under such conditions and stipulations as my said trustees or trustee shall then, in existing circumstances, deem expedient to render the same most useful and beneficial; with power also to my said trustees or trustee to make such advances to each of them while minors, as may be deemed expedient to accomplish their education, and bring them forward with advantage.

The testator's son, Charles Angus, had three children, the eldest, Mrs Jane Ronald Crawford, who was married in 1820 to Dr William Crawford, Maria, who still survives, and a son, who died soon afterwards without issue. By an antenuptial contract entered into between Dr and Mrs Crawford, and to which Charles Angus was a party, considerable sums were settled upon them by the latter, and it was declared that "the provisions in favour of Miss Angus will not preclude her from what she may receive at the death of her father or grandfather." Dr Crawford's jus mariti was not excluded as to any part of his wife's fortune. No. 1

Jan. 20, 1831
Cowan v.
Crawford.

In 1822, William Angus, the testator, died, having been predeceased by his son, Charles Angus. Of the trustees named three accepted and acted in the trust. Shortly thereafter, one of them having died, another having become bankrupt, and the third having left the country, an application was made to the Court by the testator's widow and others interested in the succession, for the appointment of a curator bonis, and Mr Charles Morland, agent for the Paisley Bank at Stranraer, was appointed accordingly to that office.

Dr William Crawford died in 1826, leaving an only child of the marriage, the claimant, William Ronald Crawford. Mrs Crawford was constituted by deed of settlement his general disponee and sole executrix, and the residue and produce of the estate was, after payment of his debts, to be laid out for behoof of her in liferent and of his heirs in fee.

Neither at the time, nor during the subsistence of the marriage of Dr and Mrs Crawford, was any payment to these parties or division of the trust-estate made by Angus's trustees, nor did they exercise the powers committed to them of settling the shares of the estate falling to the truster's grandchildren under such conditions as they should think proper.

In the course of the years 1827 and 1828, Morland, the curator bonis, made a payment to Mrs Crawford of £400 out of the residue of the estate provided to her, and invested £1500 thereof in bonds. Having been advised that her right under the succession of William Angus had opened during the subsistence of Dr Crawford's marriage, and vested in him jure mariti, as falling under the goods in communion, the bonds bore that the sums therein stated were borrowed from Mrs Crawford, as general disponee and sole executrix appointed by her deceased husband, by the hands of Mr Morland, to whom they were taken payable in trust for behoof of Mrs Crawford in liferent and William Ronald Crawford in fee.

William Angus's widow, for whom provision had been made in the trust-deed, died in 1830.

In December, 1831, and February, 1832, the two surviving trustees, who, though they had ceased to act had never given up the trust, wrote letters respectively to Morland, calling on him to lay out on good available security Mrs Crawford's share of the trust-funds in his hands, the bonds to be taken in her name, to herself in liferent and to her child or children in fee.

In these circumstances, a creditor of Dr Crawford's having used arrears of the funds in his hands, Morland raised a process of multiple-petition to ascertain how the residue of William Angus's estate was to ¶ 105. be disposed of, the balance of the share provided to Mrs Crawford, amounting to about £1800.

William Cowan, banker in Ayr, as a creditor of the deceased Dr Crawford, and of his representatives, claimed to be preferred to that part of the fund in medio which fell to Mrs Crawford under her grandfather's trust-settlement, or at least to so much of it as should appear to be the amount of interest falling due on her share of the residue during the subsistence of her marriage with Dr Crawford.

Mrs Crawford claimed to be preferred to the balance of her share, to be laid out and invested agreeably to the directions given by the surviving trustees of William Angus in the exercise of the powers conferred on them to that effect.

William Ronald Crawford claimed the fee of his mother's share of her grandfather's trust-estate, or at least that the same should be laid out agreeably to the directions given by the surviving trustees.

For Cowan it was pleaded:—

Mrs Crawford's interest in the residue of the estate vested in her on the death of the testator, and, as personal property falling to her during the marriage, it became subject to her husband's jus mariti, and is now liable for his debts. With reference to the discretionary powers conferred on the trustees, it is material to observe that the fee of his share of the residue is expressly conveyed to Charles Angus's children, under which conveyance the beneficial interest could not but vest in them immediately; and the proceedings of the curator bonis tend likewise to show that these powers had been considered inoperative. But these discretionary powers were never capable of being exercised in regard to Mrs Crawford's share, for the words of the deed by which they are conferred do not apply to such of the grandchildren as might at the testator's death be either major or married, and cannot be extended to the situation of a grandchild married, as Mrs Crawford was; the principle of construction applicable to cases of this sort being that "where a testator, in the disposition of his property, overlooks a particular event, which, had it occurred to him, he would in all probability have provided against, the Court will not rectify the omission by implying or inserting the necessary clause." And where the limitation and control of an already vested interest by means of the exercise of certain powers is in question, the precise words of the deed are to be especially regarded.* Even if intention should be taken into view in construing the settlement, the wish of the testator, looking to the other provisions of the deed, and to the peculiar notice of the bequest to Mrs Crawford, most probably was that the regulation of the rights of his grandchildren attaining majority or becoming married during his lifetime should be retained in his own hands, and that the discretionary powers of the trustees should be exercised in no other cases than those embraced by the express words of the deed. There is, moreover, no authority to be found in the special terms of the deed for holding that the trustees might delay the exercise of their discretionary power beyond the date of the actual marriage; and, therefore, their proposal, post tantum temporis, to put it in force is inadmissible. Besides, from the bankruptcy of the one surviving trustee,<sup>1</sup> and the permanent residence abroad of the other, the trust management must be held to have so lapsed as to render the exercise of this power inept and incompetent, and it is questionable if the Court could validly interpose to support the alleged objects of the trust.

* 2 Williams on Executors and Administrators, 794, and cases there cited.

For Mrs Crawford and W. R. Crawford it was maintained:—

Although the succession of William Angus opened previously to Dr Crawford's death, the share of the residue thereby provided to Mrs Crawford and her children did not vest or form part of the goods in communion, or fall under her husband's jus mariti, in respect the discretionary powers conferred on the trustees in relation to the provisions to the testator's grandchildren, were not exercised during the subsistence of the marriage; and, therefore, no creditor of Dr Crawford's can legally claim or attach the fund in medio in payment or security of his debts. Angus's trust-settlement being a mortis causa deed, it was only after his death that these powers could come into operation; and their exercise was made a condition of the complete vesting of the interest in the estate in the persons of his grandchildren. No absolute right of property in any sum or subject was conferred on Mrs Crawford, on the death of the truster. If any claim could be said to have vested in her, it was a claim of a peculiar kind, the full and complete establishment of which was made to depend on the will of third parties. The only right that did vest being in this way conditional, it could neither voluntarily nor otherwise be transformed into an absolute and unconditional right in favour of any creditor or other person deriving right through Mrs Crawford's husband.<sup>2</sup> Besides, according to the terms of the deed, the period of the ascertainment and division of the residue is made contingent on the death of the truster's widow, who survived till 1830, while the marriage of Dr and Mrs Crawford was dissolved in 1826; no right, therefore, could be so vested in Mrs Crawford anterior to those events as to fall under her husband's jus mariti. This view is consistent with the intention of the testator as it is to be gathered from the terms of the fifth provision of the trust-deed, and the general declaration following thereon. There is finally no ground for holding that DOWAN v.

CRAWFORD.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor, adding the subjoined note * :—“ Finds that the power of regulating the investment

* “ 1. It is very clear to the Lord Ordinary, that the power and duty of the trustees, to attend to the interest of Mrs Crawford, as a daughter of Charles Angus, and of any child she might have, as opposed to the interest of her husband, were not at all superseded by the circumstance of her having been married before the testator's death. On the contrary, according to the evident intention of the testator, it rendered the call on them to do so more imperative. Such a question cannot be determined by a rigid construction of the word ‘then,’ used demonstratively only, with a reference to events, which at the date of the deed, were prospective, and might be after the testator's death. He made no deed subsequent to Mrs Crawford's marriage, and therefore nothing can be inferred as to the construction of the words, from his surviving that event. But his real meaning is to be found in the whole clauses of the deed, and is made manifest by the provision in the case of Janet Hornell, compared with the clauses, special and general, affecting the shares of the children of Charles Angus. Janet Hornell was married at the date of the deed; and the testator first provides expressly, that, if she survives him, her share shall be invested by the trustees, to her, in life only, and her children in fee, excluding the jus mariti; and then he declares that if she predeceases him, her share shall belong to her children, but that, whether she survives or predeceases, the trustees shall take charge of the interest of her children ‘in the same manner as I have appointed them to take care of that of the children of Charles Angus,’ and gives power accordingly to secure and establish such interests in both cases. It is after this, that the general clause on page 7 occurs; and the Lord Ordinary can have no doubt of the true meaning of it. In the event which occurred, the powers of the trustees came into operation at the testator's death: And the Lord Ordinary has no idea, that such a power as this was evacuated, because it was not instantly exercised, or that it could be so, as long as the money was not either paid, or expressly demanded. Neither of these things did, or could take place here; because the money was necessarily locked up till long after Dr Crawford's death in 1826. But if it had been otherwise, Dr Crawford could have made no demand on the trustees, but either to pay the money, or to invest it under the power given to them.

“ 2. The Lord Ordinary is of opinion, that the trust was not extinguished, or evacuated, by the appointment of Mr Morland as factor loco tutoris, or by the circumstance which rendered that appointment necessary. A question was much discussed before him, how far the Court could interpose to support the objects of such a trust, where all the trustees had failed by death or otherwise, so as to be incapable of exercising a discretionary power given to them. The Lord Ordinary thinks, that he is not called upon to decide any such question in the present case; though he is not prepared to hold, that in no case, the Court would interfere to preserve the ultimate interests of a trust, notwithstanding that the later practice has been adverse to their doing so, without necessity.—See Bell I. p. 35. But here there were two surviving trustees. One of them, Mr Boyd, had become bankrupt; and if the matter rested upon him, it would be necessary for the Court to decide whether bankruptcy extinguished the trust, in a case where the interests of the parties concerned required its continuance. In the case of McDowal, Nov. 20, 1789, the Court did find that a trust had fallen by the bankruptcy of the trustee. But it is evident from the report, that the Court did not intend to lay down a rule, that in all cases bankruptcy would produce an absolute incapacity in the

and destination of the share of the residue of the funds of the late William Angus, falling to the claimant, Mrs Crawford, as a daughter of Charles Angus, which was conferred on the trustees, named by the said William Angus in his deed of settlement, and on the acceptor and survivor of them, did not become inoperative, in consequence of the marriage of the said Mrs Crawford in the lifetime of the testator: Finds that the trust, and the power of appointment vested by it, were not evacuated by the death of one trustee, the departure of another from this country, and the bankruptcy of the third; nor by the appointment of the pursuer as curator bonis: Finds, that notwithstanding the arrangement so made for the custody and management of the property, the trust still subsisted, for the protection of all the interests involved in it: Finds, that it was still competent for the surviving trustees, to exercise any power, vested in them by the trust-deed, in so far as their situation enabled them to do so, and the interest of those for whose benefit it was given, required it: Finds, that, in the circumstances of the case, and the fund ascertained as the share due to the claimant, still remaining under the trust, though in the hands of the curator bonis by authority of the Court, the surviving trustee to do any thing, even where it was necessary for the objects of the trust, that the powers should not perish. Accordingly, Mr Bell, in referring to that case of McDowal (Bell I. p. 32, note), distinctly explains it as not importing any such rule. And in such a case as the present, though it might be necessary for the Court to take the funds out of the hands of the bankrupt trustee, it does not follow, that he might not still be in full capacity to attend to the interest of children, in the ultimate investment of the money as authorized by the deed.

"But even this question does not properly occur. For Mr William Angus, the other trustee, was and is still alive. He went to the West Indies no doubt, and thereby became unable to take the actual charge of the funds; and the legal remedy for his absence was obtained by the appointment of Mr Morland as curator bonis. But Mr Angus was in no way divested, and was under no other incapacity. If he had returned to this country, he might have resumed the whole management, and called on the Court to supersede the temporary appointment of the curator bonis as no longer necessary. But a curator bonis could not exercise the discretionary powers of a trust; and Mr Angus, though residing abroad for a time, was not thereby disabled from exercising any such power, consistently with the objects of the trust, and for the benefit of parties interested in the settlement. The Lord Ordinary thinks, therefore, that he at least had full power to give the instruction which he has given.

"The letter of Mr Boyd was necessary even in this view; because he is a surviving trustee, and there is more than reasonable doubt whether he has not also power to act. It cannot hurt the instruction by Mr Angus, but it may be necessary to it, and at any rate corroborates it.

"The other points in the interlocutor do not require any particular explanation. There may be doubt whether the letters are sufficient in point of form, the curator bonis having no power to act by his own title. But they are at least sufficient to warrant the Court to authorize the investment, or otherwise to hold the fund till a more formal document, if thought necessary, shall be produced.

"Though the Lord Ordinary decides against the claim of Dr Crawford's creditors, he thinks that there is such reasonable doubt in the case as to justify the trial of it, and therefore he finds no expenses due."

No. 105. trustees were warranted and justified by the evident intention of the testator, in requiring that the money should be invested in the annuities expressed in their letters produced, so as to secure it for the benefit of the two claimants, Mrs Crawford and her son, according to their respective interests: Finds, that the principal of the said fund being so held under trust, subject to the exercise of the power of investment, and under the burden of the widow's annuity, which subsisted till long after Dr Crawford's death, never was vested in Dr Crawford, or payable to him, as personal estate falling under his jus mariti; and that it was not carried by his deeds of settlement; but Finds, that in so far as any interest became due to Mrs Crawford, after satisfying the widow's annuity and the other primary purposes of the trust, during the subsistence of her marriage with Dr Crawford, if any such there were, such interests must be considered as in bonis of the said Dr Crawford, and as carried by his settlements: Finds, that the rights of the claimants, Mrs Crawford and William Crawford, could not be prejudiced by any act of the current hands in holding out the funds in any particular terms; and that the assertions used by the other claimants, as creditors of Dr Crawford, were not sufficient to attach the said funds as part of his estate: Finds, that the letters of Mr William Angus, and Mr Edward Boyd produced, contain a sufficient expression of their will as trustees, at least to the effect of rendering it competent and necessary for the Court, either to direct the fund to be immediately invested, in terms of the instructions so given to the judicial factor, or to remain in publica custodia, till any more formal appointment, that may be thought necessary, shall be made; Therefore, repels the claim of William Cowan, except to the limited extent above expressed; and, subject to that exception, prefers the other claimants, Mrs Crawford and William Crawford, according to their respective claims; but, before granting any decerniture or warrant, appoints the cause to be enrolled, in order that the above findings may be correctly carried into effect; reserves any question as to the liability of Mrs Crawford to the claimant, Mr Cowan, as representing her husband, Dr Crawford: Finds no expenses due so far as hitherto incurred."

Cowan reclaimed on the merits, and W. R. Crawford on the point of expenses. Mrs Crawford also reclaimed as to expenses, and prayed the Court to alter the interlocutor in so far as to find that the interests which became due to her, during the subsistence of the marriage with Dr Crawford, if any such there were, belonged to her exclusively, and were not in bonis of her husband, nor carried by his settlements.

When the cause first came before the Court their Lordships expressed doubts, and ordered cases. It was finally put off for advising this day.

LORD GLENLEE.—I could not differ from the fundamental point of the interlocutor as to the trust not being evacuated; but as to the exercise of the powers of the trustees, it is a different matter. I see no statement of the trustees having interfered in any other way than in giving the directions contained in the two letters; and that was not a joint determination. I doubt if the act of curatory appointing Morland was regular. There may be ground for the Court causing the fund to be invested in the mean time; but as to the extent of the powers of the trustees I am more doubtful, and also whether they could interfere at this particular time in regard to the mode of investing the fund.

LORD MEDWYN.—I am inclined to concur in the interlocutor. The fifth is the material clause; but I cannot hold the marriage of Miss Angus at the date of the trustee's death to be of so much consequence. The trustees have ample powers conferred on them, and if it was material that the fee should be secured to her children, I cannot think that the limiting of her right to a life interest is any excess of power in the trustees. They seem to be entitled to alter the form of settling, with Mrs Crawford's consent. The authorities from the English law don't bear upon this case, Mrs Crawford's right being limited by the conditions of the settlements. Perhaps the trustees should act more formally in the trust; yet I cannot hold it to have been evacuated by the appointment of a curator bonis, or to have yet expired.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I am of opinion that the interlocutor is right, and think the whole deed must be looked to in this question, which is one of intention. It appears to have been the purpose of the testator, to confer the largest powers on the trustees he named; he invested them with the power of securing the provisions of all his grandchildren, under such conditions as they should think expedient, "to render the same most useful and beneficial to each of the said children and their respective representatives." (His Lordship here referred to the clauses.) I think the provision as to Mrs Hornell is important as explaining the testator's intention. It is clear that he intended the trust to continue and be effectual, and that the powers in question should be exercised. As to the subsistence of the trust, nothing has happened to evacuate the powers of the trustees. They are still entitled to come forward and express their wish in regard to the disposal of the money, but I agree with the Lord Ordinary that it should be by a more formal document than the letters referred to. On the whole I do not think that there has been any great deviation from what was within the trustees' powers as to this lady. What is wanted is only to make the fee of the fund effectual to her and her representatives, and to have it invested in the most beneficial way.

LORD MEADOWBANK was absent.

THE COURT refused all the reclaiming notes, and adhered to the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, but remitted to his Lordship to supersede till the trustees should execute such formal appointment in exercise of their powers under the trust as they should deem expedient; and found no expenses due.

THIS was an action at the instance of two superiors holding by one title the right of the superiority of certain subjects jointly, pro indiviso, directed against the vassal’s trustee, and concluding to have it found and declared that the defender was bound to fulfil the prestations of the feu-contract, and that he should be ordained to make payment of the feu-duty and to enter with the pursuers as superiors.

It was pleaded, inter alia, in defence, that the conclusion to have the defender ordained to enter with the pursuers as superiors was incompetent, and that a vassal was not bound to submit to a multiplication of superiors.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor, adding the subjoined note * :—“The Lord Ordinary having considered the closed

* “It is perhaps singular, but it does not appear that the precise point here agitated has occurred in any reported case, or is distinctly adverted to by any institutional writer. There is no doubt as to the general rule, that a vassal is not bound to submit to a splitting of the superiority into parts, and a multiplication of superiors, by giving one part to one person, and another part to another. But the Lord Ordinary sees no authority for holding, that an estate of superiority may not be held by two persons, by a joint title pro indiviso, or that the vassal is entitled to refuse to take an entry to the whole subject from the joint superiors tendering one charter; and he thinks that there is some authority for the reverse, in a case which, though not precisely parallel, affords an inference a fortiori.

Jan. 21, 1
Muir.

" The reported cases on this point of feudal law, of the vassal's right to object to the multiplication of superiors, have almost all occurred in connexion with contested elections of Members of Parliament. But it is evident, that in every such case, there necessarily must have been a proper splitting or division of the superiority into separate parts or estates. The operation would have answered no purpose otherwise. So it was accordingly in the cases of the Duke of Montrose, &c. v. Colquhoun, January 31, 1781; Graham v. Westerra, May 23, 1826; and also in Maxwell v. Macmillan, June 9, 1741. The facts of this last case are not distinctly brought out in the reports of Kilkerran and Clerk Home, M. 8817, though the argument implies what was the character of the conveyances. But there is a report by Elchies, No. 4, Superior and Vassal, which renders the state of the case perfectly clear, as being that of a positive splitting for creating separate freehold estates of superiority as qualifications for election. Whatever loose expressions, therefore, may occur in the appeal case (as alleged at the bar) it is simply impossible that the question could relate to a joint pro indiviso title of superiority.

" The case of heirs-portioners comes nearer the point, though it is not the same. Heirs-portioners are not joint proprietors, but as their name imports, part-owners or portioners. They hold pro indiviso, while the subject is undivided. But each has a title in herself to her own part or share, which she may alienate or burden by her own separate act. The condition of two joint-proprietors in the fee is very different; they have no separate estates, but only one estate vested in both, not merely pro indiviso in respect of possession, but altogether pro indiviso in respect of the right. The distinction is the same which the Lord Ordinary believes is expressed by English lawyers, by the terms joint-tenants and tenants in common.

" But that case of heirs-portioners does, notwithstanding, furnish some authority for the present question. The law holds, that an estate in superiority is indivisible; and therefore, when there is but one such right, the eldest heir-portioner is entitled to take it, compensation being made to the rest otherwise. And hence it is held, that the vassal under such a right is not bound to take an entry of a part from any of the heirs. Yet the same authority which so decided, held expressly, that if all the heirs-portioners concur in offering one charter of the whole, the vassal is bound to accept of it. This was in the case of Lady Luss v. Inglis, July 30, 1678, M. 15028. The judgment in which, as reported by Stair, is in these words:—'The Lords repelled the defence, and found that the vassal was not obliged to take infeftment severally from the heirs-portioners of the superior, but either from the whole jointly, or from the eldest by the prerogative of her birth.' Stair himself, 3, 5, 11, expressly adverts to this finding in mentioning the decision; and it is more pointedly taken notice of in a note to one of the editions of his work, at 2, 4, 17; see More's edition, p. 256. Bankton, also, so states the law, that the vassal is not bound to take infeftment of all the heirs-portioners, 'unless they concur in one precept.'

" The case of two joint-proprietors in the fee, is evidently a case a fortiori. They not only may concur, but must concur in every title to be granted. There are not two estates, but one estate only. The superiority is not split at all.

" The Lord Ordinary does not rest any thing on any view of expediency or convenience. But it would evidently be attended with great inconvenience, if it were to be held that a profitable estate of superiority could not be at all held with its issues and profits, by two parties jointly in the fee. On the other side, the vassal has always his remedy. If the joint-superiors will not, or cannot concur in one charter, he is not bound to enter with them at all; and if he desires an entry, he is in that case entitled to pass them over, and enter with the over superior. That was the precise remedy given in the case of Lady Luss."

No. 107. as the pursuers, Robert Cargill and James Cargill, now standing by the death of Mrs Cargill, the liferentrix, in the full fee of the superiority in question, hold the said right of superiority jointly, by one title pro indiviso, and must concur in any entry to be granted to the defender as vassal, if he shall be found liable to take such entry, there is no splitting of the superiority or multiplication of superiors, to entitle the defender to object to the title of the pursuers to maintain the conclusions of the summons in this action: Therefore, Repels the said objection and defence, appoints the cause to be enrolled, in order that the parties may be heard, so far as it may be necessary, on the other pleas stated in the defence, and on the mode of disposing of such of them as involve disputed matters of fact; and in the meantime, reserves all questions of expenses.

The defender reclaimed, and argued, that he was not bound to take entry in the manner proposed, which involved an increase of difficulty and expense in the making up of his titles, and greater insecurity than in an entry with a single superior; that the case of heirs-portioners bore upon the present question, the eldest of whom was alone entitled to receive an entry, and that expressly on the ground that the vassal's condition was not to be made worse by being compelled to hold of more superiors than one.<sup>1</sup>

LORD MEDWYN.—I agree with the Lord Ordinary. I can conceive difficulties occurring in such cases, but not here, for these pursuers hold under one title. They are pro indiviso proprietors, and have but one seisin. There is an analogy between heirs-portioners and pro indiviso proprietors, but the two rights are quite distinct.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I also concur with the Lord Ordinary. There is no attempt to multiply superiors. A single entry is offered, and I can see no objection to it, looking to the manner in which this right of superiority is held by the pursuers.

LORD GLENLEE concurred.

Cessio Process.—An unopposed cessio, which was raised under 6 and 7 Wil. IV. c. 56, was inrolled and pleaded in the Inner House, after the expiration of the statutory intimation; the pursuer was personally present in Court; held competent, and in the circumstances, expedient, to administer the oath to him in Court, without making any remit to the sheriff under the twelfth section of the statute.

THIS was a process of cessio raised under 6 and 7 Wil. IV. c. 56. After the intimation of thirty days had expired, and the cause was inrolled in the Inner House, the Court called on the pursuer's counsel to make an oral statement of the case, in the same manner as under the old form. This was done, and no opposition being made.

Crawford, for the pursuer, who was present in Court, moved the Court to allow him to take the oath, and to pronounce decree finding him entitled to the benefit of the process of cessio.

The clerk of Court called the attention of their Lordships to the provisions of the twelfth section of the act, which declares that it shall be competent to remit to the sheriff of the county where the pursuer is domiciled, to have him examined on oath in presence of his creditors, and a report made to the Court before pronouncing decree.

Crawford, for Pursuer. That provision only applies to the case of an opposed cessio, and where there is occasion for a sifting examination of the pursuer's affairs. Where no opposition is offered, and a satisfactory statement has been submitted to the Court, the old form should be adhered to, of immediately administering the oath in their own presence, at least where the pursuer, as in this instance, was in attendance. And as it was not imperative on the Court to make a remit to the sheriff, but merely declared competent to do so, there was no sufficient ground to warrant such remit in this cause.

The Court, after some discussion, acted on the suggestion of Lord Mackenzie, which was to the effect, that this was a common proceeding in absence, in regard to which the statute did not contemplate a remit to the sheriff to take the oath, at least where the pursuer was in Court and ready to take it; and their Lordships allowed the oath to be taken before them in common form.

This was done, and, a trust-dispensee for the creditors being named by the pursuer,

THE COURT found him entitled to the benefit of the process, and pronounced decree accordingly.

GEORGE MOON was proprietor of Russell Spinning Mill, in the county of Fife, at which mill Christian Anderson was hired as a spinner or carder in 1824. Moon subsequently became tenant of Hospital Mill, which was situated about half a mile nearer than Russell Mill, to the village of Springfield, where Christian Anderson lived. Many of the other workers at Russell Mill also resided at this village. At Russell Mill a notice was posted up, intimating that all the workers who intended leaving the work at Martinmas in any year, must give notice in August preceding; that the same notice would be given by the master if he did not intend continuing the service of a worker; and that, failing notice, both parties were bound for another year. This intimation continued posted up at the mill, as regulating the employment of the workers. The same notice was also posted up at Hospital Mill.

In January 1830, some years after Hospital Mill was occupied by Moon, Christian Anderson was removed to Hospital Mill, to which she made no objections: several other workers had also been removed from Russell Mill to Hospital Mill, when the latter was taken by Moon, and continued to be employed there afterwards. It did not appear whether any of them had stated objections against this removal. The species of work at both mills was the same, and the wages also were the same. There were some tradesmen or mechanics in Moon's service, who were occasionally employed at the one mill, and occasionally at the other, just as their services happened to be required at either: and a few of the spinners at Hospital Mill had, at least once, been temporarily transferred to Russell Mill, during a period when the work at Hospital Mill was impeded, owing to a deficient supply of water. But there was no general practice, in reference to the workers at either of these mills, of transferring them at

Moon's discretion, from one mill to the other, and there was no condition of this nature inserted in the printed regulations. No. 10

On Saturday the 29th of November, 1834, the manager of Hospital Mill intimated to Christian Anderson that she was to go to work at Russell Mill on the following Monday. She objected to this change, alleging that her engagement, which ran from year to year, and did not end till Martinmas 1835, was for service at Hospital Mill only, where alone she had been employed for several preceding years; and that this was above a half mile nearer to her residence than the other mill. On Monday following she offered to continue in her employment as usual at Hospital Mill, but this was objected to, and she was told she must go to Russell Mill, which she refused to do and left the work.

Jan. 24, 1835.
Anderson
Moon.

Some attempts were soon afterwards made by the manager of Russell Mill to persuade her to go there, and in particular it was promised that her victuals should be brought to her at the mill from her home, so as to obviate the objection that she would not have time to go home for her meals, at the brief interval allowed for meals. This interval was half an hour in winter, and three quarters of an hour in summer.

On December 24, 1834, Moon presented a petition to the Sheriff of Fife, stating that Anderson had refused to work at Russell Mill after being required to do so; that she was bound to work there till her term of service should expire at Martinmas 1835; and that he suffered loss and inconvenience by her desertion. He prayed the sheriff "to cite her to appear personally for examination, with certification, &c.; and upon the premises being admitted or proved, to grant warrant for imprisoning her person in Cupar Tolbooth, therein to remain on her own expenses, until she shall find sufficient security, acted in the Sheriff Court books, to return to the petitioner's service, and to remain there until Martinmas next, and faithfully perform her usual work; as also to find her liable in £10, or such other sum, &c. as damages;" and expenses. The judicial declaration of Anderson was taken, and a proof was led, which established the facts already stated. Moon attempted to prove that when Anderson was removed to Hospital Mill, it was intimated to her that she must return to Russell Mill when required; but he failed to establish this. The sheriff considered it proved that there was a known practice of removing workers from one mill to the other at Moon's discretion, and found, that, in the circumstances, Anderson was bound to work at Russell Mill in place of Hospital Mill whenever required by Moon to do so; particularly as the work and wages were the same at both mills, and the difference between them in point of distance from her home was not great. The order was qualified by the condition that Moon should provide a person to carry her victuals to her while employed at Russell Mill, as his manager had made that offer to Anderson "in order to remove any obstacle as to distance."

No. 169. Anderson brought an advocacy, to the competency of which, Moon took an objection, which was repelled.<sup>1</sup>

* NOTE.—“The Lord Ordinary considers this question of importance as a precedent. It is settled law that the judge ordinary or justices of peace, in the exercise of their powers as police magistrates, may grant warrant to apprehend an apprentice or servant who has deserted his work, and to ordain him to return, or if necessary, to imprison him until he find caution to return. This, though sometimes a harsh proceeding, is sanctioned by usage, and occasionally it may be requisite: for a workman, by deserting, may do great injury to his master, and such as he has not the means of repairing. But the remedy ought not to go farther than the necessity of the case requires, which is only to maintain the possession as it was at the period of desertion, leaving it open to the parties, if they are at issue as to the terms and conditions of their contract, to try the question by the ordinary form of process. If it were not so, they would meet as in a civil question on a very unequal footing; for on this criminal, or at least police proceeding, the workman is either apprehended or ordered to appear personally in court, and the very first step is to take his judicial declaration, while the master is neither required to appear personally, nor to submit to an examination, nor even to state his pleas in detail before his opponent is interrogated. It is plain, that if this were competent, when it is matter of dispute what the nature of the engagement is, the master would have a very great and unfair advantage. Accordingly, the cases of Wright<sup>1</sup> and of Stewart,<sup>2</sup> in which it was found incompetent for the Judge Ordinary to ordain an apprentice who had deserted his service to find caution that he should return and fulfil his indenture, proceed upon this principle. But these are precedents a fortiori in this case; for the sheriff not only ordains the advocator to return to her work, and to fulfil a contract, the terms of which are not ascertained by any written contract as an indenture, but which he thinks he can gather from the judicial declaration of the advocator, and the proof adduced. It will be observed that by this interlocutor, he does not maintain the possession, as it stood at the date of the desertion, for the girl was working, and had worked for three years previously at Hospital Mill. He decides as to the terms and conditions of the contract, as to which parties were at issue, and he inserts a new condition, which, confessedly, made no part of the agreement, but which the respondent suggested with the view to obviate the advocator's objection to remove from the one mill to the other. And this interlocutor is pronounced upon a petition, the only prayer of which is that the advocator shall find security to return to the respondent's service, to remain there till Martinmas next, and faithfully perform her usual work.

“On the merits, it is admitted that, by a yearly engagement, which had been thrice renewed, the advocator had worked at Hospital Mill. She objected to be transferred to Russell Mill on grounds which do not appear to be imaginary or capricious. Russell Mill is proved to be about half a mile farther from Springfield, where most of the spinners reside, and where the advocator lives with her parents, than Hospital Mill. So that, during the half-hour in winter which is allowed for meals, or even the three quarters of an hour allowed in summer, she could not, without great inconvenience, go home and return. And this seems to have been virtually admitted: for the respondent offered to employ a person to bring her victuals to the mill. But this might by no means remove the objection which she and her parents may reasonably have entertained. She is only nineteen years of age, and her two elder sisters were engaged at Hospital Mill, under whose inspection she worked there, and with whom she went and returned home, and which, in year, and that at the time the last year's engagement commenced, she Moon.

 was employed as a spinner at Hospital Mill, as she had been during the two preceding years; finds it is not proved that when the advocator was removed to Hospital Mill in January 1830, it was intimated to her that she was to return to Russell Mill when required; finds it is not proved that it was the practice at the work to remove spinners from Hospital Mill to Russell Mill, as it suited the convenience of the respondent; finds that the contract subsisting at the date of the petition must be held as applicable to Hospital Mill alone, and that it was ultra vires of the sheriff to modify that contract, by adopting a suggestion made by the respondent, and to which the advocator had never acceded: Therefore advocates the cause, alters the interlocutor of the sheriff, assoilzies the advocator from the conclusions of the action, and decerns; and finds the respondent liable in the expenses incurred in this and in the inferior court, in so far as they have not already been found due."

winter, may have been under cloud of the night. At Russell Mill, she was deprived of their protection; and to detain her there in the way suggested by the respondient, during the interval of rest, when all the other workers were unemployed, as well as herself, may have been considered rather as increasing than removing the grounds of her objection. But, at any rate, this proposal of bringing her victuals made no part of the contract, and, as already said, had never been acceded to either by her parents or herself.

"The respondent pleads that it was intimated to the advocator, when she and her sisters were removed to Hospital Mill in January 1830, that she might be required to return to Russell Mill. There is no evidence of this. Smith, the managur, depones that he made such an intimation to the advocator's eldest sister Margaret, but, in the first place, he is a single witness; and there is no circumstance to corroborate his evidence. Margaret was tendered as a witness, but the respondent objected to her being received; and Smith himself does not say that he made any intimation to the advocator. So that even according to his evidence, it is a mere conjecture that Margaret mentioned the circumstance to the advocator, or that she ever heard of it.

"The respondent also pleads that it was the practice at the works to send the spinners from one mill to another, as it suited the respondent's convenience. When the proof is carefully examined, it will be found that this averment is not established. It is true, that when the respondent first took the lease of Hospital Mill, a number of spinners were brought there from Russell Mill. But to this they could have no objection; because it was much nearer their home, and therefore much more convenient. It is also proved that some of the mechanics and gasmen were employed indifferently at the one mill or the other; but their case is quite dissimilar to that of the girls employed as spinners. Their time is in their own hands; and it must be of very little consequence to them where they work. But there is no evidence of spinners being transferred from Hospital Mill to Russell Mill, except in one case in summer 1833, when, in consequence of a scarcity of water at Hospital Mill, either two or three carders were sent to Russell Mill, a fact admitted in the judicial declaration of the advocator. A single instance of this kind is no proof of a general practice at these mills. It may be added, that no notice of this condition is to be found in the regulations at Hospital Mill, which were stuck up for the information of the persons employed at the work."

Guarantee—Right in Security.—Where a debtor assigned a life-policy in security of certain advances, and his friend granted a relative guarantee for payment of the premiums, and annual interest on the advances—Held that the sum uplifted by the creditor out of the policy, after the debtor's death, must be imputed, after satisfying the principal of the advances, in extinction of an arrear of interest due on them, and not in payment of any other debt due by the deceased to the creditor.

THIS was a special case. In October, 1822, Sandeman entered into an agreement with the late Edward Fraser, merchant, Inverness, to cash Fraser's bills, to an amount not exceeding £2000, on certain terms. As part of the same agreement, Fraser assigned to Sandeman a life-policy for £3000, in security of the advances he might make under the agreement; and Shepherd, writer in Inverness, also granted a letter of guarantee for payment of the premiums on the policy, and the interest on Sandeman's advances. This letter was part of the same agreement. Fraser became bankrupt in December, 1822, at which time Sandeman was in advance, under the agreement, to the amount of £1856. Shepherd continued to pay the premium on the policy till 1827, when Fraser died. He also paid the interest on Sandeman's advances, until September, 1826.

The Insurance office brought a multiplepounding, as to the contents of the life-policy, in which process Sandeman was allowed to uplift £2000 out of the fund in medio, to relieve him of his advances. He afterwards raised an action against Shepherd for £127, as the amount of interest due on his advances from September, 1826, till January, 1828, when the interest on the sum in the policy began to run.

Shepherd pleaded in defence, that the difference between the amount of Sandeman's advances (£1856), and the sum uplifted by him (£2000), exceeded the sum of interest claimed, and must be imputed against that interest, preferably to any other debt which might be due by Fraser to Sandeman.

Sandeman stated, that Fraser obtained a discharge from his creditors, and afterwards granted bills, with the knowledge of Shepherd, for the above balance of £1856, which were renewed from time to time, so as to keep the sum in a floating state, and relieve him from being in dead advances; that various transactions in business occurred between them, and in particular, there was a bill for £300, in addition to the £1856, which was granted in circumstances such as to make it also be covered by the security of the policy; that this more than exhausted the £2000 uplifted in the multiplepoinding, and that the whole interest claimed on £1856 remained to be paid by Shepherd under his guarantee.

The Lord Ordinary and the Court were satisfied, in the circumstances, that only the sum of £1856 was secured by the policy; that the difference between that sum and £2000 should be imputed, in the first place, to the interest sued for; that the interest was thereby extinguished; and that Shepherd must be assoilzied.

Their Lordships accordingly assoilzied.

Process—Appeal.—Three declarators were conjoined, and a unanimous judgment was pronounced, which disposed of the whole merits of one of them—Observed by the LORD PRESIDENT, in granting a petition for leave to appeal, that it appeared competent to appeal, without leave, where the whole merits of that declarator were exhausted, although a remit was made to the Lord Ordinary to proceed with the other two declarators in the conjoined process.

AFTER judgment was pronounced in the declarator at the instance of Sir Norman Macdonald Lockhart of Lee and Carnwath, in the terms already reported,<sup>1</sup> he presented a petition for leave to appeal. The judgment had been unanimous, and the petitioner stated, that though the judgment exhausted the whole merits of his declarator, yet, in respect of that process having been conjoined with other two declarators, as to which a remit had been made to the Lord Ordinary to proceed, he was doubtful of the competency of appealing without leave of the Court.

THE COURT granted the petition, the LORD PRESIDENT observing, that, as the merits of the declarator at the instance of the petitioner were exhausted, it appeared to be competent for him to enter his appeal, without leave of the Court, notwithstanding the dependence of the other actions in the conjoined process.

THIS was a case of a special nature. William Renny, who was common agent in the ranking and sale of the subjects, belonging to the estate of the bankrupt estate, which lay in the old town of Glasgow, was covered by an heritable bond, in which Renny acquired right by paying the contents of the bond out of certain proceeds of the subjects, and obtaining conveyance of the bond and subject to himself as common agent and trustee for behoof of the postponed creditors in the ranking. The bond contained a power of sale which limited the place of sale to Glasgow, and an application was made by Renny to the Court, stating that there was a heavy feu-duty payable out of the subject, but that it had great value for building ground, and that it could not be sold any where but at Glasgow, where alone the locality was known, without great loss to the estate; and therefore praying warrant to sell at Glasgow.

The Court were of opinion that they could not authorize a sale, in a ranking and sale, to take place any where but in Edinburgh, and refused the petition as incompetent.<sup>1</sup>

Another application was afterwards made by Renny and the creditors to have the bond and subject struck out of the ranking, in order that he might dispose of the subject under the power of sale in the bond, for behoof of the parties concerned in the subject. This petition was granted,<sup>2</sup> and Renny brought the subjects to sale at Glasgow, and obtained for it, in November, 1834, a price of £1402.

During the period when Renny had the management of this subject, while it formed part of the ranking, he had been required by the superior to pay up £185 of arrears of feu-duty accruing on the subject, besides granting an obligation to pay £25 per annum of feu-duty while the subject remained unsold. After it was struck out of the ranking he made a farther payment of £25 of feu-duty prior to the sale.

Renny afterwards raised a multiplepoinding in reference to the subjects, and a warrant was granted for the sale of the subjects at Glasgow, and a process of ranking and sale at the prayer of the creditors and common agent, and was afterwards sold by the common agent, as trustee for the postponed creditors, in the ranking.—Held, in the circumstances, that the common agent was not entitled to charge a commission of 10 per cent on the price of the subjects, partly in respect that he had charged a full account of agency, as a professional man of business, for all steps connected with the sale of it, which account bore a large proportion to the amount of the whole price realized.

lance of the price of this subject, as it could not be distributed under the ranking, and a question arose as to the amount of expenses charged by him for selling it. The auditor taxed off a sum of £35, 4s. 3d., being a charge for commission at 2½ per cent on the price of the subjects sold at Glasgow, to which taxation Renny objected, in respect he had restricted his charge to 2½ per cent, which was reasonable, considering that he sold the subject, not as common agent in the ranking, but as a trustee, and he had been obliged to make considerable advances for arrears of feu-duties, and to come under an obligation relative to the prospective feu-duties, which would have proved very serious, if the subject had not been speedily sold.

The Lord Ordinary approved of the auditor's report, and Renny reclaimed.

The Court directed the account, which, independently of the payment of feu-duties, amounted to £292, after taxation, to be printed, and their Lordships intimated a unanimous opinion, that, as every item of business and agency connected with the heritable subject, both while it formed part of the ranking, and afterwards when struck out of it, was separately and fully charged, so as to make up a very large account, in proportion to the price of the subject, there should not be an additional charge of commission on the price of the subject, on account of Renny's having sold it in the character of trustee.

THE COURT therefore adhered, and awarded expenses against Renny since the date of the Lord Ordinary's judgment.

Jurisdiction—Road-Trustees—Suspension.—Circumstances in which the Court held a bill of suspension of diligence for levying an assessment of statute-labour conversion-money, an incompetent proceeding; and accordingly refused the bill.

By the Statute-Labour Act for Stirlingshire, passed in 1810, power was given to subdivide the county into districts, and the district trustees were authorized "to name surveyors or other proper officers," whose duty it should be, on or before 5th January in each year, "to make up and report upon oath an exact list of all ploughgates of land, &c., and of all persons keeping horses, &c. liable for statute-labour or for a conversion of the same, and of all cottagers, &c. liable for a conversion for special services." of appeal by any party aggrieved by the assessment, and the general affidavit of trustees, whose judgment was above stated. The court gave the order as to the mode of laying out, by the district trustees, from any two justices of the Peace for the shire, the road the path of the collector or overseer of any district, as to the manner of improvement. The statute declared that "no suspension, appeal, or complaint, or action, shall stop the performance of the statute, or prevent the payment of the converted price thereof, for that season, which they have been appropriated, saving always, nevertheless, to the party aggrieved, a complaint, his, her, or their redress, within four calendar months, by whom he, she, or they shall have been aggrieved, or one of his, her, or their several duties, services, and conversions for the year next after the determination of the complaint made, and that the James Living, tenant in Slackstock, Stirlingshire, presented a bill of suspension of diligence which was proceeding against him, for arrears of his conversion-money, at the instance of Henry Gordon, writer in Glasgow, clerk to the district trustees of the district in which his farm was situated. He alleged that such irregularities had been committed in imposing and levying the assessment, that the charger and the district trustees were not within the protection of the statute, and therefore that it was open to the jurisdiction of the Court of Session to review the charger's procedure on the merits. In particular, he alleged that no survey had been taken, and that the assessment had been made when the warrant for levying the assessment had been applied for. The bill was ordered without caution. Respondent Robert Bogle and Co. and Others.

The charger and trustees answered, that the party empowered to make up a list of persons liable in assessment might be either a surveyor, or other proper officer; that the collector (charger) was such proper officer, and had duly made up the list, and that he had made oath before the Justices, on applying for the warrant. They also pleaded that, by the statute, the remedy of suspension was expressly cut off; that another course of procedure, such as appeal to the next general meeting of trustees, was pointed out; and that, even when a party was aggrieved by the Willingale done against him, a remedy was directed to be sought out of the convention for next year, but in the mean time, the money required for supplying a service as the maintenance of the roads, must be paid forthwith. The plea of the parties involved a good deal of detail and special circumstances. The Lord Ordinary on the Bills (Meadowbank) in vacation refused the bill, with expenses, both on the competency and the merits. A second bill was refused by the Lord Ordinary (Cockburn), with expenses. Having obtained a new petition to be amended, and ordering a new

The Court considered it, in the circumstances, to be a narrow and difficult question whether the irregularities alleged against the charges for that betwixt the constitution of the Court and the Court's decision to make were of such a nature as to render a suspension a competent proceeding, in the face of the words of the statute already quoted. Their Lordships accordingly delayed giving judgment for a short interval after hearing parties, after which they intimated that they considered the suspension incompetent, and that they did not enter on the merits. Their Lordships were understood to be moved chiefly by the following considerations:—1st, The pressing nature of the public service for which the assessment was imposed; 2d, The combined effect of the absolute prohibition of a suspension, and the pointing out of a different mode of obtaining relief, if aggrieved, including, inter alia, a remedy against the conversion money of future years; 3d, The provision for allowing the warrant to be obtained upon oath being made by the collector, which oath was apparently made in this case; and, 4th, The suspender's failure, generally, to instruct irregularities of so high a degree as to throw the charge out of the protection of the statute.

The Court adhered, and awarded additional expenses.

1st Division.

“or to do otherwise in the premises as to your Lordships shall seem proper.” Robert Bogle and Co. and others, opposed this appointment, and suggested another nominee. After a discussion before the Court, both parties agreed to the nomination of a third person (Aitcheson), and a difficulty was then stated by the Lord President whether, in point of form, such third party could be appointed under a petition which expressly prayed for the nomination of Patten only, without allowing the prayer of the petition to be amended, and ordering a new course of intimation

The Court considered it in the circumstances to be a matter of course

THE COURT intimated their acquiescence in this opinion, and accordingly appointed Aitcheson, as suggested by both parties.

Small Debt Act, 6 Geo. IV. c. 48.—1. The creditor in an account indorsed it over to a party, who thereafter sued for and recovered the contents in a Justice of Peace Small Debt Court; in a reduction of the Justices' decree, on an averment that the Justices had “maliciously committed the most apparent iniquity,” defence sustained, that the facts alleged were not such as to infer malice or oppression on the part of the Justices, without which being established the decree could not be opened up. 2. Opinion intimated, that, under the 6 Geo. IV. c. 48, a legal practitioner holding a bona fide assignation to a debt was entitled to appear for himself in the Justice of Peace Court and follow up the claim.

n. 26, 1837. By the act 6 Geo. IV. c. 48, § 5, it is enacted, that “when the parties shall appear, the Justices shall hear them viva voce, and examine witnesses upon oath, and also the parties by declaration, or upon oath, provided always that no procurator, solicitor, or any person practising the law, shall be allowed to appear or plead for them, either viva voce, or by writing, nor shall any pleadings, arguments, minutes, or evidence be taken down in writing, or entered on any record.” And by the 7th section, it is provided, “that it shall be competent for the Justices, if they shall see reason, in the circumstances of the case, for so doing, to allow the pursuer or defender to be heard in the matter of his complaint or defence by one of his family; or, if the pursuer should not be resident nearer than 20 miles from the place where the Court is held, it shall be competent for the Justices, if they shall see fit, to hear him by a person holding a written mandate or authority from him for that purpose, the said mandatory not being a procurator, solicitor, or person practising the law.” It is farther provided, by the 14th section, that no decree of the Justices “shall be set aside or altered in an action of reduction before the Court of Session, on any other ground except that of malice and oppression on the part of the Justices.”

In August, 1835, the defender, the Rev. James Begg of Libberton, procured from the Edinburgh Police Establishment, on payment of a sum

After the dog had been <sup>Jan. 26,</sup> in his possession about three months, the pursuer, Kay, who was the <sup>Kay v.</sup> true owner, made a demand to have it restored; with which demand Mr Begg complied, on condition of being indemnified for the expenses incurred. Thereafter he made out an account against Kay, consisting of the following items, and which he indorsed to the other defender, Balfour.

" 1835.

Aug. 15. To paid Police Establishment for young Newfoundland dog, being one stated by them to be unclaimed by any person,

Oct. 15. You having claimed the above dog as yours, to two months' keep of dog, at the same rate charged by Police, viz. 6d. per day,

£2 5 0.

" Pay the above sum to Mr Thomas Balfour, Agent, 8, Heriot Place, Edinburgh.

(Signed) JAMES BEGG."

Balfour, who, although he acted as a doer or agent, was not a legal practitioner, then brought a complaint, in his own name, as indorsee of this account, before the Justices, sitting under the act 6 Geo. IV. c. 48, against Kay, the owner of the dog.

Kay admitted that Mr Begg had paid the sum of 15s., and had kept the dog about three months, but offered certain evidence to show that the debt was not due, which being held to be irrelevant, was rejected. The Justices decreed for repayment of the 15s., but modified the charge for the keep of the dog to 3d. a-day. The decree, which was taken in name of Balfour, was extracted, and payment was made accordingly.

Kay then raised action against Mr Begg and Balfour to reduce the decree, on the grounds, inter alia, that it was "iniquitously, oppressively, and incompetently" pronounced by the Justices, and in contravention of the statute; that Mr Begg, although the real party at whose instance the claim was insisted in, had employed Balfour professionally to appear for him, having indorsed the account to Balfour for the purpose of evading the intent and tenor of the provisions of the act above quoted; and also that Kay was not truly due the sum in question; and that the Justices in pronouncing the decree, had "maliciously committed the same to an incompetent tribunal." In support of these grounds of reduction, it was averred in the summons, that Balfour had laid before the Justices a written statement of his case, which they had received and taken into consideration; that they had refused to hear Kay, and rejected evidence tendered by him of facts showing the debt sued for not to have been truly due.

In defence against the action, it was pleaded—

1. No facts implying malice or oppression on the part of the Justices have been set forth in the summons, and none can be instructed by evidence; and the decree cannot be opened up and set aside unless it shall be established that it proceeded from malice and oppression on the part of the Justices towards the pursuer.

2. The decree was well founded on the merits, seeing the sum decerned for was merely the amount of the expenses incurred for advertisements and for the maintenance of the dog.

3. Balfour was in right of the debt sued for by indorsation, which is a legal and valid mode of transference; and, moreover, he is not alleged to have been, and in fact is not, a law-agent or procurator, such as is contemplated by the statute.

The Lord Ordinary “sustained the first defence,” and dismissed the action, finding the pursuer liable in expenses.

Kay reclaimed.

LORD MEADOWBANK.—I am for adhering to the interlocutor. The defender, Balfour, received an indorsation to this account, which is a legal mode of transferring the right to an open account. There is no allegation that he was not in the full right of the account. He then raised his suit before the Justices, and they pronounce decree finding him entitled to recover the sum in question. They could have done nothing else. We are told of the danger of the statute being evaded by such indorsations. I see no authority in the statute to prevent the ordinary operation of law, or interfere with the right which a man has to indorse his account away to another. It is said we may open a door to admit law-agents in the Small Debt Court, in contravention of the act. This party does not seem to have been such an agent; but if a law-agent is in the full right of a debt, I see nothing to prevent him appearing before the Justices to make it effectual.

LORD MIDWYN.—I am not satisfied that any thing has been done in contravention of the provisions of the statute. It is not alleged that this party was a procurator, or person practising the law; but there seems to be no doubt that, if such a person have a small debt to recover, it must be competent for him to bring it before this Court. Malice is certainly libelled in the summons, but there are no grounds stated for inferring either malice or oppression.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—We have always treated questions coming before us under the 6 Geo. IV. c. 48, as of great importance. In the present case, I see no grounds for altering the Lord Ordinary's judgment. It is impossible to say that facts are set forth inferring malice or oppression. In regard to the alleged deviation from the provisions of the statute, it is quite clear that there is nothing in it which prohibits what is a matter of every-day practice, and is just an assignation of the account. We have such indorsations coming frequently under our no-

No. 112. — Robert JAMIESON, W.S., came under interdict and suspension, amounting to about £10,000, on behalf of Alexander Colvill of New-

 Bill-Chamber, trust-deed contained powers of sale, and Jamieson having advertised part of the lands as for sale, in October, 1868, a bill of suspension and interdict was presented to the Lord Ordinary on the Bills, at the instance of Robert and James Kerr, founding on missives of sale of that part of the property at a price of £10,000, which had been concluded between Colvill and them, in December, 1868, and under which contract they alleged they had already consigned £4000 of the price for Colvill's be-

Answers were ordered, and an interim interdict was granted.
 In his answers, Jamieson, besides alleging that no adequate provision was made for his own security, farther pleaded, that the trust was for benefit of Colvill's general creditors, and that he could not denude under their claims were satisfied also.

The Lord Ordinary (Mackenzie) recalled the interdict, refused the bill, and found the complainers liable to the respondents in expenses.

In a second bill of suspension, which was offered on caution for all damages and expenses, the complainers farther alleged, that Jamieson was perfectly cognizant of the missives of sale, and was substantially a party in the transaction. The prayer of the bill was directed against Colvill and also against T. B. Ferrie, W.S., the partner of Jamieson, who was alleged to be concerned in the proceedings.

Answers were ordered, and interim interdict was granted.

Jamieson alleged that the missives of sale had been impetrated from Colvill at a price far below the value of the subject; and he denied that he had been in any way a party to or cognizant of the sale. Colvill concurred with Jamieson in opposing the suspension.

The Lord Ordinary passed the bill and continued the interdict.

~~Notes.—The Lord Ordinary can see no ground on which the trustees can be interdicted from using the powers of sale, on the application of the complainers.
 If they had stated facts showing that they had made the trustees a party to the bargain of sale alleged to have taken place between them and the trustees, the case would have been very different. But nothing of that kind is stated; and the case seems just to come to the general case of an alleged sale of property by the trustees, without consent of the trustees, and without authority of the court. The Lord Ordinary cannot see on what ground an alleged purchaser in such a sale can interdict the trustees, or how the trustees could

GEORGE DUNDAS, Pursuer.—Rutherford—Coventry.

No. 1

JOHN DUNDAS, Defender.—D. F. Hope—Napier.

Settlement—Clause—Executor.—1. A holograph will, after leaving certain special legacies, contained the following clauses:—"Any money left after paying all expenses, I wish may be laid out on charities. I leave and bequeath to A. B. £200, with power to see this will executed."—Held that the provision in favour of charities was not void through uncertainty, the term "charities" being sufficiently expressive of the objects of her bounty, and it being held that a power of selecting and distributing among them was conferred upon A. B. according to the tenor and meaning of the will. 2. A direction being given, that certain plate and furniture, &c., "be divided equally," without specifying among whom—Held, in the circumstances, by the Lord Ordinary, and acquiesced in, that the division should be equally among the next of kin of the deceased.

MISS AGNES DUNDAS, daughter of Ralph Dundas, merchant in Edinburgh, executed a holograph Will, in which, after enumerating a list of legacies, chiefly of sums of money, the following bequest occurred:—

1st Div.
Ld. Full

"Any money left after paying all expenses, I wish may be laid out on charities."

"I leave and bequeath to my nephew, John Dundas, the sum of £200 sterling, with power to see this will executed."

(Signed) "AGNES DUNDAS."

"The furniture, bed and table linen, I wish to be divided equally, and the silver plate, and any valuable books; the rest may be disposed of."

The latter bequest was declared to be a codicil to the Will. It appeared that a sum exceeding £600 remained after paying all expenses, and every legacy excepting that which related to "charities." An action was raised by George Dundas, one of the next of kin of the deceased, against the legatee who had been empowered to see the Will executed, concluding to have it found and declared, 1st, That as the plate, furniture, &c., were directed to be divided equally, without saying among whom, the division must be made among all the next of kin, because it must be presumed that such was the intention of the testatrix, if her intention was truly discoverable; and if it was not discoverable, the division must still be among the next of kin, as in the case of intestate movable succession; 2d, That as the residue was only directed in general to be laid out "on charities," without specifying what these charities, or charitable purposes, were, and as no power of selection was expressly

Nov 1837 James v. James, the testator, who had no children, left his estate to his wife, to be paid to her at her death, and there being no means provided by the Will, of rendering it certain or definite. The defender had no more power than if he had been simply an executor nominate or dative: and such an executor could not have supplied the defect in the Will, by selecting "charities" at his own discretion, as the objects of the bequest.

The defender answered, 1st, That the Will was tantamount to a direction to distribute the plate, furniture, &c., equally among the next of kin, which he was ready to do; and 2d, That although no charities were specified, yet a power was conferred on him to select among them at his discretion; and thus the Will was not void through uncertainty. In every case of construction of a settlement, the cardinal rule was to proceed according to the true intention of the testator, whether expressed or distinctly implied. In this instance, by selecting some of the charitable institutions of Edinburgh, where the testatrix resided, he (the defender) might feel certain that he was giving effect to the true meaning of her Will, by distributing the residue among them. And if this was plain, her Will, he must have power to make the distribution in terms of it, as he was appointed specially "with power to see this Will executed," which was a larger appointment than a mere nomination, of him as executor would have been.

The Lord Ordinary found, that the division of the furniture, bed and table linen, silver plate, and valuable books, amongst the next of kin, and determined that the bequest to "charities" was not void on the ground of uncertainty or indistinctness; but does, when combined with the terms of the appointment of the defender as executor, import a discretionary power on his part to select the charities on which the bequest is to be conferred. Therefore, and to this extent, sustained the second defence, and absolved the defender from the conclusions of the action; but found no expenses due, and decreed.

NOTE.—There seems no room here for the objection of uncertainty. The objection applies when it appears that the testator had some particular object in view, but has failed either in defining that object, or in specifying more of the more definite operation, to its precise accomplishment. This last, for instance, might have been the ground of the decision in the case of Ewen v. the Magistrates of Montrose, (Wilson and Shaw's Appeal Cases, vol. IV, 340,) referred to by the court.

"Here there is no uncertainty as to the meaning of the testator. She clearly had no special charity in view. Her object was the general one—that the residue should be laid out on charities, and there can be no doubt that the application of the money to any objects falling under that general description (of 'charitable' meaning is sufficiently clear), would be a due fulfilment of her intention on that point. The Lord Ordinary is not prepared to say that such a bequest would not have been good, even without the appointment of an executor, against her husband, his confirming as executor at law. But any difficulty on that point is here removed; for immediately following the direction that the residue shall be 'laid out on charities,' there is the bequest to the defender of £200, 'with power to see the will executed.' It appears to the Lord Ordinary that, in such construction, this must Dundas v. Dundas.

LORD BALGRAY.—I am satisfied that the interlocutor is right. The defender was appointed executor; he was named to see the Will executed; and he must do that, secundum arbitrium boni viri. And I should think that any of the next of kin would have a title to enforce the performance of this duty according to the true intent of the testator. I think, therefore, that the defender's interpretation of the settlement is well-founded, and that he must just proceed as he proposes to do.

JUROR PRESIDENT.—The interlocutor is quite right. Nothing is more common than to see one person place a sum of money at another's discretion, merely directing him to apply it to charitable purposes. A man, for instance, sends a donation to the minister of a parish to be distributed by him. And if this be frequently done, inter vivos, I cannot see why it may not equally be done, by the intervention of a Will. In regard to the precise words of this settlement, I conceive that they are a little stronger than the simple nomination of an executor. Power is expressly given "to see this Will executed." Suppose that a special legacy of £500 had been left to "charities," and that the residue had been given to some other party, is it to be held that the whole of the Will was to be executed, excepting the payment of the legacy to charities? Could the Will be said to be executed, unless that sum was laid out on charities? If a special sum had been so bequeathed, I should have felt no difficulty whatever: and, in point of principle, I do not perceive any difference between that and the present case.

LORD MACGEEZIE.—I think the case not altogether free of difficulty, but in all the circumstances, the interlocutor appears to be well-founded. If no executor had been nominated, but a bequest in these terms had been left to "charities" in the abstract; and one of the next of kin had confirmed as executor dative, I should have felt the case to be attended with very considerable difficulty. Or even if there had been a simple nomination of the defender as executor, I should still have thought there was a good deal of difficulty. But the circumstances of this case are materially different from either of these. After stating that "any money left, after paying all expenses, I wish may be laid out on charities," a sum of £200 is left to the defender "with power to see this Will executed." Now can I have any doubt, on a fair interpretation of the Will, that it was the intention of the testatrix, that the defender should have the power of seeing the provision in favour of charities executed, as well as the other provisions of the Will? If the words used were such as to lay any limitation on the executor's power, I should have felt satisfied that it was contrary to this lady's intention. She clearly meant the defender to have every requisite power for executing, out and out, all the provisions of the Will, in all its parts. And I am satisfied she meant to confer on him a power which clearly imports a discretionary power in the executor to make that selection of charities without which her will, in regard to the immediately preceding legacy, could not be carried into effect; and this construction, of course, brings the case within the rule established in the case of Grierson v. Chrichton, and the other cases referred to by the defender.

Major Emergency Issues and Long-Range Climate Goals

11) Testament—Provisions to Children—Vesting.—A testator appointed his trustees at the expiry of fourteen years from his decease, to dispose of certain lands, and divide the proceeds among his surviving children, the shares of those predeceasing without issue accreting to the survivors equally; the deed provided, "that the shares falling to each should not be liable to be affected by their debts or debts while in the hands of the trustees, and should only be liable to such contingencies after the same is actually paid over and discharged;" shortly after expiry of the term, three sons and three daughters of the testator then surviving, the trustees with consent of the sons, entered into a minute of sale, whereby they bound themselves, on payment of the price, to dispose the lands to the daughters, the sons being ex-Maritimus following; some days thereafter one of the sons died, and, previous to the date of the minute, disposed his right of succession to his estate—held that the share of the price or value of the lands accruing to the deceased had not vested in him at the date of his death, so as to be carried by the operation to his sisters, but that it accreted equally to them and their two brothers.

THE late George Wilkie of Auchleshie, by trust-disposition and settlement, dated in May, 1818, conveyed his whole heritable and moveable property to certain trustees. The purposes of the trust were as follows:—
 1. As soon as possible after the testator's decease, the trustees were to sell and dispose of his whole property, excepting the lands of Auchleshie, Hillends, and Redhall. 2. They were then to divide the free residue of the proceeds equally among all his children then in life. 3. The trustees were to retain the lands of Auchleshie, &c. in their management for fourteen years after the testator's decease, arranging so as that the leases should expire with the termination of that period. 4. After payment of an annuity to his widow, the residue of the rents of these lands was to suffer an annual division at the term of Martinmas yearly, among all his children then in life. 5. At the expiry of the above fourteen years, the trustees were directed to sell the lands of Auchleshie, &c., by public roup, due notice being given by advertisements; and, finally, The trustees were appointed "as soon after the sale of said lands as possible, to divide the free surplus and residue thereof among all my children then in life, or their issue, per stirpes, equally, share and share alike, the shares of the predeceasers without issue always accrescing to the survivors equally, but the shares falling to each of my said children, as aforesaid, shall not be liable to be affected or attached by their debts or deeds while in the hands of my said trustees, and shall only be liable to such contingencies after the same is actually paid over to them and discharged."

 Wilkie v.
 Wilkie.
 2d Division.
 Lord Jeffrey.
 T.

George Wilkie died in January, 1820, leaving three daughters, the claimants, Elizabeth, Isabella, and Jane Wilkie, and five sons, three of whom, the claimants, John and Duncan Wilkie, and the late James Wilkie, survived the expiry of the term of fourteen years from the testator's death. The trustees accepted and administered the trust. When the fourteen years had elapsed, which happened in January, 1834, the trustees, in terms of the deed, formally exposed the lands of Auchleshie, &c., to public sale, but without success.

Thereafter, by an arrangement, to which the six surviving children of George Wilkie were all parties, a minute of sale was entered into on 7th August, 1834, between the trustees on the one part, and the claimant, Elizabeth Wilkie, and her two sisters, on the other part, whereby the trustees, with consent of the three brothers, bound and obliged themselves, on receiving payment of the price, to dispoise to Elizabeth Wilkie, and her sisters, the lands of Auchleshie and others,—the purchasers' entry to be at the term of Martinmas, 1834; and the dispoonees became bound to make payment to the trustees of £6967, "as the stipulated price of the shares of the said lands and others above described, relating to the interests of the said James, John, and Duncan Wilkie, being the remaining members of the said family, having an. 27, 1837. the said term of Martinmas next, in the present year, 1834.”

 Wilkie v.
 Wilkie.

On the 19th August thereafter, James Wilkie died, having, previous to this transaction, disposed and assigned to his sisters his whole interest and right of succession in his father's means and estate. In these circumstances, it became matter of question whether James Wilkie's interest in the price had so vested in him as to be carried by this disposition. In the mean time, the Misses Wilkie made payment to the trustees of £4645, being the two shares of John and Duncan Wilkie, and granted their promissory note for £942, or two-fifths of the share of the price effeiring to the interest of the deceased James, they being in any view themselves entitled to the other three-fifths.

Thereafter the trustees raised an action of multiplepounding, to determine the rights of the parties interested in the succession.

The Misses Wilkie on the one hand, and John and Duncan Wilkie on the other, respectively claimed to be preferred for the amount of two-fifths of the share of the price effeiring to the interest of their deceased brother.

The Lord Ordinary having ordered Cases, it was

Pleaded for the Misses Wilkie—

1. The claimants, as the disponees of their brother James, are entitled to the whole of his share of the price of the lands of Auchleshie, &c., the said share having vested in him before his death in virtue of the intention of the testator, and the conception of the trust-deed. The rule is, that under such provisions as that in question, the rights of the residuary legatees vest from the moment that the period of limitation has expired; but the present case is still stronger, because James outlived not only the expiry of the fourteen years, but likewise the sale of the estate, whereby the price was fixed and the fund ascertained, and nothing more remained to be done than to pay the money to those who had right to receive it.

2. By the nature as well as the terms of the transaction by which the estate was disposed of, the shares became immediately thereafter vested rights, and the transaction was in itself de facto a division and distribution of the estate. The whole members of the family, including James, were parties to the arrangement regarding the minute of sale; and where all parties interested agreed to such an arrangement, no objection can be stated against it, though the immediate vesting of the rights should cause, de facto, an earlier division of the fund than might otherwise have taken place.<sup>1</sup>

Pleaded for John and Duncan Wilkie—

This is entirely a question of intention, arising inter hæredes; and the intention is very clearly to be gathered from the terms of the 6th provision of the settlement, which lead unavoidably to the conclusion, that a child predeceasing, without issue, the division to follow on the realization of the price of the lands, could have no interest in the succession, and was incapable of affecting it by his deeds. Admitting the general principle as to the immediate vesting of beneficiary interests, there is no room for its application in the case of an express declaration, that these interests shall not accrue to the heirs or legatees, until the estate have been realized and distributed.<sup>1</sup> And the minute of sale affords no special ground for altering the rights of parties as under the trust-deed, pointing distinctly, as it does, to the ensuing Martinmas as the period when any interest in the property or price of the lands was to vest in the purchasers.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor, adding the subjoined note : *—“ Finds, that upon a just construction of the trust-deed of George Wilkie, deceased, and also of the transaction entered into among his trustees and surviving children, on the 7th of August, 1834, no share of the price or value of the lands of Auchleshie can be held to have vested in James Wilkie at the time of his death on the 19th of the said month of August, and that the share of the said price which might have vested in him, if he had survived the ensuing term of Martinmas in that year, accresced, in terms of the original trust-deed, to the five children of the said George Wilkie who survived the said term of Martinmas, equally among them,—and to this extent, sustains the claim of the claimants, John and Duncan Wilkie, and rejects (or restricts) that of the other claimants, Elizabeth, Isabella, and Jane Wilkie: Finds the said claimants, John and Duncan Wilkie, entitled to interest at the rate of five per cent.

* “NOTE.—Looking only to the father's trust-deed, there scarcely seems to be room for a question,—the clause providing, that none of the shares shall be affected by the debts or deeds of the children, till actually paid over by the trustees, (by which the Lord Ordinary understands, till they might and ought to have been paid over,) appearing to have been introduced expressly to exclude the present claim of the sisters. Their only maintainable argument is, on the effect of the transaction of 7th August, which may be contended to have recognised a de presenti right in them as purchasers, and to afford a plausible ground for holding, that if any of them had died after that date, and before Martinmas, that right would not have accresced to the survivors, but might have transmitted to assignees or adjudgers. On consideration, however, the Lord Ordinary is satisfied, that there is no solidity in this view, and that it was not the intention of any of the parties to vary or renounce any of the provisions of the trust-deed, as to the vesting or succession of the shares of the children. As the price, indeed, is, by that very transaction, made payable, not to the brothers individually, but to the original trustees, it seems altogether impossible to hold that they were not still to dispose of it according to the express directions of the truster. To obviate this conclusive view, it was suggested, that it might be held that a new trust was substantially created by the implication of that transaction of August; but this seems quite inadmissible and extravagant.”

Wilkie v.
Wilkie.

The Misses Wilkie reclaimed.

LORD MEDWYN.—I find nothing to object to in this interlocutor. If the trustees had not acted properly, I might have held the subjects to have vested prior to the death of James Wilkie; but there is no such allegation. The trustees could not by any act of theirs have paid over the share of this party prior to his death. Taking this minute as a proper minute of sale, we are to consider the Misses Wilkie, in regard to the question of vesting, just as ordinary purchasers.

LORD JUSTICE CLERK.—This is a question of intention, and I think the interlocutor right. It is clear that in regard to the two parts of his succession, this testator had two purposes in view, and he expresses himself accordingly in a different manner as to each of them. The case of Thorburn is a decisive authority on the point in question. In the transaction as to the sale, it is clear that the trustees had it in view to facilitate the purchase of the lands of Auchleshie by the testator's daughters. But the matter depended on the literal fulfilment of every part of the transaction: the whole might have flown off before the term of Martinmas, when only the transaction was complete in terms of the minute.

LORD MEDWYN.—There is no contradiction between the case of Stevenson and that of Thorburn, and I agree that the latter applies a fortiori to the present case.

LORD MEADOWBANK.—I do not wish to interfere with the case of Thorburn, but I have this difficulty. It is admitted that the provision as to the Auchleshie property was different from that as to the testator's other property; but there must be clear expressions showing that it was to be differently disposed of as to the period of vesting. The moveable succession vested a morte testatoris; and looking to the words of the clause providing for the division of the Auchleshie property after the period of 14 years, I am bound to interpret them so as to make the whole deed uniform. In regard to the other part of the case, I am inclined to think that James Wilkie's share would have vested from the commencement of the transaction of sale, supposing the whole six children to have entered on the agreement. If the shares of the sisters would have vested, it would be inequitable to hold that the shares of the sons should not vest also.

Husband and Wife—Revocation.—Terms and provisions of a postnuptial contract and subsequent deed of settlement by the husband with consent of the wife, which held not to admit of a power of revocation by the husband on the death of the wife, or to imply that certain legacies contained in the deeds had become ineffectual in consequence of her predecease.

ABOUT the year 1785, the pursuer, Anderson, married Ann Coats, a widow, having two children by her first marriage, for whose maintenance funds were provided by their deceased father. There was no antenuptial contract. Of this marriage there was issue one daughter, the defender Jean Anderson, afterwards married to one Garroway. Anderson, who was a weaver, and Mrs Anderson having subsequently acquired certain funds partly by their industry, and partly by inheritance from Mrs Anderson's relations, they executed in 1804 a postnuptial contract of marriage, whereby provisions were made in various events. In the event of the wife's survivance, a total liferent was provided to her. In the event of Anderson surviving, and entering into a second marriage, and his daughter Jean being then in life, he thereby "dispones, assigns, conveys, and makes over from him, his heirs, and successors, to and in favour of the said Jean Anderson, one just and equal third part pro indiviso, of all and haill the whole heritable subjects which shall be pertaining and belonging to him at the decease of the said Ann Coats his present wife, and particularly without prejudice to the said generality, the heritable subjects in Bridgeton wherein he presently stands infest and seized, conformable to his instruments of sasine duly recorded, burdened with the liferent right of the said James Anderson during all the days and years of his lifetime; and the said James Anderson, in the event of his so entering into a second or future marriage, binds and obliges himself to make payment to the said Jean Anderson his daughter, during his life, of the sum of £10 sterling yearly, &c." On the other hand Mrs Anderson made over to her husband "the whole heritable and moveable subjects presently pertaining and belonging to her, or which may happen to pertain and belong to her at the time of her decease, or which may be competent to be claimed by her nearest in kin through the dissolution of the marriage, as also her whole paraphernalia and wearing apparel." Both parties bound themselves "not to alter these presents without mutual advice and consent."

the reasons and causes therein mentioned, settled the succession of our whole heritable and moveable properties, in favour of the persons therein mentioned; and under the burdens and provisions therein expressed; and, whereas, we, the said James Anderson and Ann Coats, have now thought it advisable and expedient in some respects, to alter and amend the said postnuptial contract, we, by these presents, accordingly do so, under this express provision and declaration, however, that in so far as the said postnuptial contract is not altered or corrected by these presents, it shall remain valid, sufficient, and effectual in other respects, and to all intents and purposes, as if these presents had never been entered into;” and farther, “wit ye us the said James Anderson and Ann Coats, in the event of the death of the longest liver of us both, to have bargained as we do by these presents, burden our heirs, executors, and successors, with the payment of the following legacies and sums of money.” By this deed, Mrs Anderson’s liferent was left untouched, and certain legacies were bequeathed to her children by the first marriage, which were laid partly on the share provided to her daughter, Mrs Garraway. In regard to their grandson, James Anderson Garraway, the deed bore that in place of him “receiving his liferent right pro indiviso, with his brothers and sisters mentioned in said postnuptial contract, I the said James Anderson, with consent of the said Ann Coats, my wife, hereby in lieu and instead thereof, dispose, convey, and make over from me, my heirs, and successors, to and in favour of the said James Anderson Garraway, my grandson, in liferent, and to his children lawfully begotten, equally in fee after the death of the longest liver of us both; first, the whole dung belonging to my heritable properties situated in Bridgeton; and secondly, all and whole my lands and property of Nerston,” &c. In the event of his wife predeceasing, and Anderson marrying again and having children, it was farther declared that his second wife, after his death, should enjoy the liferent of two-thirds of his heritable property, excepting the lands of Nerston, the other third being provided to Mrs Garraway as in the postnuptial contract.

Mrs Anderson died in November 1834, and, in January 1835, Anderson married a young woman who had been previously a servant in the family. Thereafter he raised action against his daughter Jean Anderson and her husband and the other parties interested in the postnuptial contract and subsequent settlement, libelling on these deeds, and concluding to have it found and declared, that the said deeds, in so far as granted in favour of the defenders, were revocable at his pleasure, and that he was entitled to convey away either onerously or gratuitously the estates and effects therein disposed of, or otherwise, that all the conveyances and provisions contained in these deeds in favour of the defenders have already lapsed and can never be effectual in consequence of his wife having predeceased him.

In support of his action Anderson pleaded—

1. The deeds libelled on are revocable, (the deed of 1825 having been granted without any consideration on the part of the wife and merely with her consent), in respect that the provisions in question in favour of the defenders are gratuitous and mortis causa, and a power of revocation is implied in them. 2. According to the true construction of the deeds, the provisions, especially that to James Anderson Garraway in 1835, were not to take effect in the event which has happened, of the pursuer surviving his first wife.

In defence it was maintained—

1. The deeds libelled on are not revocable by the pursuer, in respect that the parties thereto expressly bind themselves not to revoke or alter the same, except by their mutual consent, which provision in the first deed was confirmed and renewed by the partial alterations contained in the second.

2. The deeds are not revocable, in respect that they do not constitute gratuitous donations, but are mutual and onerous contracts by which the pursuer's wife, the mother of the principal defenders, gave up the rights of her next of kin, in the event of her predecease, in return for the provisions thereby made in favour of her children and grandchildren.

3. The deeds in question are not revocable, in respect that the provisions which they contain are not mortis causa, but are constituted by dispositive words de presenti, and direct conveyances inter vivos, with procuratory and precept, some of them becoming exigible, even during the lifetime of the pursuer.

4. According to the true construction of the deeds, none of the legacies thereby conveyed can be held to have lapsed or become ineffectual by the predecease of the pursuer's first wife.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor, adding the subjoined note: *—" Finds, I mo, That neither of the joint deeds of

* " The point of construction (though more broadly libelled) was argued only as to the provision to James Anderson Garraway and his children, under the deed of 1825; and solely on the ground, that this provision is there declared to be given 'instead and in lieu' of a joint and contingent liferent provided to him by the former deed of 1804, and that, as the former liferent was given only in the event of the husband's predecease, and could never have been claimed, in the event which has actually happened, of his survivance, so this surrogatum should equally be held to have lapsed by the same occurrence. The Lord Ordinary is satisfied, however, that there is no solidity in this view of the matter. Where one provision is declared to be 'instead or in lieu' of another, this merely means that the first is withdrawn when the second is bestowed, but by no means implies that the second is to be taken under all the same conditions as might have been attached to the first. It is, in short, an independent and separate grant, consequent, indeed, on the revocation of another, but affected only by the conditions specially attached to it. There is, accordingly, no inconsistency or impropriety in finding that a certain fee is given 'instead and in lieu' of a contingent liferent, and in so far as the children of James Anderson Garroway are concerned, this is precisely the case which has occurred. The contingency of the wife's survivance is so far repeated or implied, the grant being to take effect (like all the legacies and annuities given along with it) from and after the death of the longest liver, of the spouses, husband and wife indifferently. The point as to the surviving husband's power of revocation generally was more confidently argued, and upon premises and assumptions which were, for the most part, unexceptionable. But there was a fatal flaw, as it appeared to the Lord Ordinary, in connecting them with the conclusion.

"By the original deed of 1804, the wife had merely a total liferent, in the event of her survivance. In the event of her predecease, the only child had one-third of the property, and the other two-thirds remained with the father, and the Lord Ordinary held it clear that none of those provisions could be altered, except by the joint act of the spouses. By the second joint deed of 1825 the wife's liferent was left untouched. But the lands of Nerston were taken out of the property before the daughter's third was again given to her, and both that third, and the remainder were burdened with the legacies and annuities there specified, most of which were in favour of the wife's relations. If these legacies had been made burdens only on the father's two-thirds, the Lord Ordinary is of opinion that he might have made this second deed without the wife's concurrence, because it would not then have been an alteration of the deed of 1804, but only an addition to it, and affecting no other interest than his own. But if he could have made such a deed of his own authority, it seems to be clear that he might also have revoked it in the same way, and not the less, although he might needlessly have taken the name and concurrence of the wife in making it. But unluckily, the legacies, &c. in the deed of 1825, are laid partly on the share of the child of the marriage, and as that was a material alteration of the original deed, it necessarily required the wife's concurrence, and made the second deed, in so far, as onerous as the first, and therefore as little liable to revocation, except by the joint granters.

"The pursuer argued indeed, and very plausibly, that as by revoking the legacies and devise of Nerston, he would actually better the condition of the child of the marriage, both by enlarging her third to its original amount, and relieving it of its proportion of those legacies, there was no interest in any one representing the mother, or for whom she could be supposed to have interfered, to object to such a revocation. A little reflection, however, will show that this is a narrow and inaccurate view of the question. The legatees under the deed 1825 are mostly relatives of the wife; at all events, they must be presumed to be persons whom she, as well as the husband, intended to favour, and to a certain extent, to favour more than her own daughter. When, therefore, she chooses to take a part of the daughter's provision, and to give it to those other persons, having full power with her husband so to do, she truly purchases those legacies for her favourites, by the part thus sacrificed of her daughter's provision, and again makes a joint and remuneratory deed with her husband, as truly onerous, and, therefore, as irrevocable as the original deed of 1804. To put this in a clear light, it is only necessary to magnify the features. Suppose that by the deed of 1804 (irrevocable except by mutual consent) the whole property is destined to the daughter. Then, in 1825, the daughter disoblige the parents, or obtains an independent fortune, and other relatives of the wife especially, come into favour, and are needful. Then a joint deed of alteration is made, by which two-thirds of the property are taken from the daughter and distributed among those other relatives, and shortly after the wife dies. Could the husband alone revoke these provisions even for the purpose of reconveying the whole property to his only

Bankruptcy—Proof.—Circumstances in which the Court held that the transactions and dealings of a party, with a bankrupt, were not such as to render him subject to examination by the trustee, under § 32, of the bankrupt act, as a person "connected with the bankrupt's business."

THE bankrupt act, § 32, after authorizing the examination of the Jan. 28, 18 child? The Lord Ordinary thinks he could not, and he has decided the case upon that principle: For he thinks it impossible, after the case of Nicolson, 16th December, 1806 (Morison voce Legacy, Appendix, No. 2), that a single judge (however inclined) should take it upon him to distinguish between the parts of a legacy left by joint testators, and to hold that it might be revoked by the survivor, in so far as it falls upon his own property, and yet be irrevocable in relation to the part which affects properties at the disposal (or joint disposal) of the predecessor.

The point, however, in this last view is one of considerable nicety; and as the case must be considered as a hard one for the pursuer (now the father of a second child), in so far as the legacies, &c. fall upon his own two-thirds of the original estate, expenses have only been given, subject to modification."

for the purpose of obtaining a full discovery of the bankrupt's estate and effects, inist for examination of his wife and others of his family, for being connected with his business, upon all proper interrogatories of a question arising as to the construction of that branch of the clause which relates to persons connected with the bankrupt's business, in the following circumstances:

The estate of James Dickson, brewer and distiller in Calton, of Glasgow, was sequestrated under the bankrupt act in June 1836, and James McCalland, accountant in Glasgow, was appointed trustee. At the statutory examination of the bankrupt, he declared that, when he entered to his distillery at Calton, in February, 1834, there was a proposal between James Nisbet, spirit dealer in Glasgow, and him, to become copartners in the distillery; but the proposal never was acted on, nothing more than one puncheon of yeast was ever bought in name of the company; and perhaps a few grain-bags were at one time brought to the distillery marked with the firm of Dickson and Nisbet, but this was without the declarant's consent; and that after the declarant had carried on the distillery for ten or fourteen days, he became desirous to form no copartnership with Nisbet, and offered him £50 to drop all farther thought of the connexion, to which Nisbet agreed. That there was a son of Nisbet's in the distillery named Robert, who entered into the declarant's service about November, 1835, and continued for three or four months, receiving twenty shillings per week of wages. That in spring, 1836, the declarant took a lease of a distillery at Helensburgh, and put it under Robert Nisbet's management, and after working it for a few months, he assigned the lease and sold the stock on hand, worth from £140 to £150, and utensils to Robert Nisbet: That the assignation was prepared by Thomson, writer in Glasgow, who was James Nisbet's brother-in-law: That in the end of April or beginning of May, 1836, the money was paid over by Robert Nisbet to the declarant, directly by Robert Nisbet, when no one else was present but Thomson: That the greater part of the money, and also the sums drawn for several days before at the brewery, were then paid over by the declarant to James Nisbet, in extinction, pro tanto, of a debt due to him, which amounted, by an account rendered by Nisbet, on 15th April, to £1534: That on 22d April he bought a quantity of barley from Ewing, May, and Co., which, on the 23d, he resold to James Nisbet, without ever having taken delivery of it, and on 25th he applied £330, being the greater part of the price, to pay malt excise duties: That on 16th April, he bought barley to the amount of £539 from John M'Call and Co., and took delivery of it: that he sold 200 bolls of this, about the beginning of May, to Robert Nisbet, for the Helensburgh distillery: That the price, being about £250, was received, he thought, in cash, in Thomson's office, and the cash was applied in paying excise duties, and extinguishing James Nisbet's debt, pro tanto: That, in a day or two afterwards, he sold thirty bolls more to Robert Nisbet, and, as he thought, paid the price

Not 187. 200 balls of wool, thought apparently sold by him but actually the bankrupt's property, held by the bankrupt's joint account with the bankrupt's wife. The bankrupt's wife then cited James Nisbet to appear for examination in respect of his being connected with the bankrupt's business.
 James Nisbet objected that he was not connected in the nature of the statute, but was not liable to examination. The Sheriff, after further advice, appointed the said James Nisbet to appear for examination, and to answer all pertinent interrogatories in writing, tending to show his connection with the bankrupt's affairs, and his liability to undergo examination under the statute. He did not come. The Sheriff, in pursuance of the order, Nisbet deposed that he had long been acquainted with the bankrupt, and knew of his having acquired right to a distillery in Galop, in the beginning of 1894. He was then asked whether any communings then took place between the bankrupt and him respecting his becoming a partner? To this question it was objected that its object was to prove him a partner, which was held to be an incompetent interrogatory in Belm, July 10, 1905. The Sheriff found that the objection was premature, and allowed the question. Nisbet then stated that there never had been a copartnership, and he had received the £50, as mentioned by Dickson, on renouncing all claim to such partnership; that he gave no receipt for this sum; that twenty-two documents shown to him, consisting of receipts, retred bills, and discharged accounts, were in his handwriting; and that he was not a cash-keeper of Dickson, nor did he keep any books of his, nor act as his clerk or agent.

The Sheriff, "in respect it is admitted by the witness that some time ago proposals were submitted to him by the bankrupt to enter into a certain partnership or joint trade, and that although he gave no express consent, yet after certain communings he received £50 from the bankrupt for which he gave no receipt, which seems to imply that some sort of partnership, of greater or less extent, had been formed between them on that occasion; in respect the bankrupt appears to have kept no regular books himself, while the documents produced, and in particular the account-current between the parties, show not merely a great variety of transactions between them, but such an intimate union, particularly in relation to bills, as almost rendered the proposed witness the banker or cash-keeper of the bankrupt,—found that the objector falls under the description of persons connected with the bankrupt's affairs or business, and therefore is subject to examination under the statute; but that under the two qualifications of being examined only on such matters as do not tend to criminate himself, and bear reference to the written documents produced in process, and founded on in this interlocutor."

Nisbet was examined under this interlocutor, and deposed that for twelve or fifteen years he had had occasional transactions in business with Dickson; that he had little buying and selling with him for two years before bankruptcy; that he never remembered to have borrowed money from him, but often lent money to him; and that he repeatedly rendered accounts before the account-current of 13th April. In the course of the interrogation, Nisbet was asked, Whether, in February last, when the bankrupt took a lease of the Helensburgh distillery, he was aware of it? and Whether he was consulted by the bankrupt before this was done, and gave advice to the bankrupt on the subject? He then objected to the competency, 1st, of examining him at all, in respect he did not fall within the statutory limits of persons examinable; and, 2d, that the questions were in themselves incompetent, being just an attempt by an opposite party, to take a precognition from him on oath, for the purpose of eliciting information, and founding an action of reduction and repetition against him.

The Sheriff found * “that the witness is bound to answer the proposed

* The entire interlocutor of the Sheriff was in these terms:—“Finds that it is a general principle applicable to legal proceedings, that a pursuer must make out his own case, and that too by evidence or documents adduced by himself, and not by information extracted either by judicial examination, or oath of his adversary—the former, that is the judicial examination, being an extraordinary remedy, competent only in the course of a suit where pregnant circumstances of fraud are admitted, or ex facie apparent; and the latter, the oath on reference, the last step, by the import of which the case, whatever it is, must be determined: Finds, on the other hand, that on the sequestration of bankrupts, the principles of the common law have to a great extent been broken in upon, it having been declared competent by statute for the trustee not merely to subject the bankrupt himself to examination upon oath, but also a variety of persons standing in certain degrees of relationship or connexion with him, without any regard to the pecuniary interests with which such examination may be attended to themselves: Finds that in determining what questions may be competently put to a witness, and what questions he is bound to answer, who has rendered himself subject to examination from his connexion in business or otherways with the bankrupt, and where a question is put to the witness tending to establish or elucidate a civil debt due by the witness to the bankrupt estate, the Sheriff is driven to a decision between the conflicting authority of the common law on the one hand, which never permits a party to lead a precognition of his future case upon oath, by the examination of the very party against whom that case is to be directed, and the authority of the statute on the other, which arms the trustee with extraordinary powers, with a view to the recovery of the bankrupt's property from the hands of any persons in whom it may be vested, or who may be alleged to have irregularly or improperly come to be possessed of it: Finds that on this subject it has been determined by the Court in the case of Belch, 10th July, 1805, and 10th June, 1806, that a party against whom an action was in dependence, to have him declared a member of the bankrupt firm, cannot be compelled to answer questions tending to shew that he is a member of that copartnery, a decision which proceeded on the principle that a witness cannot be compelled to answer to the circumstances of a cause depending between the estate and the person examined, for the inquiry is already proceeding in another course,—a decision to which effect has already been given by the sheriff in these examinations, by refusing to admit as competent questions relative to the subject-matter of the suit relating to a quantity of barley between the bankrupt and the witness: Finds that the question now objected to brings out a different point, viz. whether the witness, who has become subject to examination from his close connection with the bankrupt in business, and from having been in a manner his book-keeper, in regard to various transactions, is

No. 126. Questions, and all other questions not tending to involve him in any criminal prosecution or penalty, though they may relate to claims which the trustee may have against him for civil debts, and although he may be compelled to answer questions having reference to such matters incident to his business affairs, but not to any depending suit, either between the estate, or any person connected with the estate and the witness, but to an ulterior claim of claimant, which may be brought against the witness by the trustee, for repayment of money or recovery of property alleged to have been received by the bankrupt from the bankrupt on the eve of insolvency, under suspicious circumstances, the details of which are given in the accounts referred to in the witness examination, as kept by him for the trustee, and in the prosecution of which action or actions the information now sought to be extracted on oath from the witness may be of the most essential service. Finds that there is no express authority upon this point, and therefore it is one on which it is extremely difficult to form an opinion from the conflicting authority of the rule of the common law, and of the object of the bankrupt statute, which are thus brought into collision; but that upon the whole the weight of authority seems to preponderate in favour of the opinion, that the witness is, contrary to the principle of the common law in such cases, legally bound to answer, in respect, first, that the object of the statute is to compel the bankrupt, and all persons connected with him, or alleged to hold his property, if from their connexion with his affairs legally subject to examination, to undergo an extraordinary and searching species of examination upon oath, with a view to the recovery of the estate for behoof of the creditors, and to obviate the difficulties which the trustee otherwise might have to encounter in the discovery of the bankrupt's property when in the hands of others than the bankrupt himself; in respect, second, that the circumstances of the witness, and the close connexion which he is admitted to have had with the bankrupt in business for nearly fifteen years, has rendered him legally subject to examination, and the statute contains no exception in such case recognising a right in the alleged debtor to the bankrupt estate to decline answering any questions that may be competent to be put to other witnesses; in respect, third, that it is expressly declared by the statute 46 Geo. III. c. 37, that a witness "cannot by law refuse to answer a question relevant to the matter in issue, the answering of which has no tendency to accuse himself, or to expose him to penalty or forfeiture of any nature whatsoever, by reason only, or on the sole ground that the answering of such question may establish, or tend to establish, that he owes a debt, or is otherwise subject to a civil suit, either at the instance of his Majesty, or of any other person or persons;" in respect, fourth, it is stated by Mr Bell, that "it is not a sufficient excuse for declining to answer a relevant question, that it may establish, or tend to establish, that the person under examination owes a debt or is otherwise subject to a civil suit;" and that "where they admit that they have received the debtor's property, although they will not be compellable to answer to what may criminate themselves, and a commitment for refusal would be illegal, yet it would seem that they may on such admission be held liable for the property of which they are thus unable to clear themselves;" in respect, fifthly, it has been decided by Lord Ellenborough, in the case of Smith v. Brignell, 1 Campbell 30, Bell II. 400, note, that, even where a witness connected with the bankrupt estate, and who is charged with having concealed the bankrupt's property, had inadvertently answered a question to which he might have demurred from its tending to subject him in the double statutory penalties for concealing the bankrupt's property, yet "having given the answer, it might be used in evidence against himself for all purposes for which it was legally applicable,"—a decision which seems to proceed on the principle that the main objection against a witness being compelled to answer questions of this description, viz. that his answer may thereafter be used in evidence in a civil suit brought by the trustee aware that the present is the first of a series of questions intended to extract from him information in regard to various transactions between him and the bankrupt on which legal proceedings may ultimately be founded against himself: Therefore repels the objections, and appoints the witness to answer the question under the usual legal compulsitor." Nisbet v.

M'Lelland.

Nisbet presented a petition and complaint to the Court, founding on § 71 of Bankrupt Act, and also on his right at common law to bring under the review of the Court the judgment of the Sheriff, while acting in a situation the same as, or similar to, that of a commissioner leading a proof in a process pending in Court.

Nisbet pleaded that he was not one of the persons "connected with the bankrupt's business" in the sense of the statute. No partnership had ever existed in reference to the Calton distillery, though it had once been talked of, in 1834. His sole connexion with the bankrupt was that he had occasionally had dealings with him, as with any other customer; that he had lent sums of money to him, had rendered his accounts, and had received repeated payments, which, however, still left him a creditor. But this did not bring him within the statutory description; and indeed the chief object of the clause in the statute was to discover any funds secreted by the bankrupt for his own behoof. And if it was alleged that his transactions had been such as to entitle the trustee to reduce any of them as being illegal preferences, that only afforded the stronger ground for exempting him from being precognosced on oath by the trustee.<sup>1</sup> He objected separately to the peculiar questions put, which, however, it was unnecessary to enter upon, if the other objection was sustained.

M'Lelland answered, that the object of the Bankrupt Act was to produce an equal distribution among the creditors, and to cut down illegal preferences, as well as to discover all secreted funds. For this purpose a statutory power of examination was given, which embraced even the bankrupt's wife, as well as the rest of his family, "and others connected with his business." This was the most marked departure from the ordinary common law rules of evidence, and the sole question left was, whether the connexion of Nisbet with the business was such as fell within the purview of the statute. Then considering how intimately he was mixed up with all the chief money transactions, for some months prior to the bankruptcy; that the bankrupt had not even books of his own, or any bank where he deposited his cash, but that the chief records of his proceedings were to be found in the books and accounts of Nisbet, he tee against himself, is ill founded, as such answers are admissible evidence even in such a suit: Therefore, upon the whole, finds, though with considerable difficulty, that the witness is bound to answer," &c., as quoted above in the report.

stood within the position contemplated by the statute, especially as his son, while in the bankrupt's employment, had been mixed up with many of these transactions. All these considerations were strengthened by the transaction in 1824, as to a partnership in the Cotton distillery.

It is not necessary to say that the petitioner is not one of the persons whom the statute has rendered subject to examination. In regard to the alleged connection, so far back as February, 1824, it merely appears to have resulted in this, that what over the parties had at one time intended, the bankrupt had given a sum of £10 to Nisbet, and put an end to all connexion with him as to that matter. But that is just the reverse, so far as it goes, of proving that he was connected with the bankrupt's business. Then with regard to his other transactions, if such a construction they implied was to subject a man to examination under the statute, I think any man who walked into a haberdasher's shop and bought goods from him, might be equally said to be connected with his business, and to be liable to examination in the event of his supervening bankruptcy.

LORD GILLIES.—I am of the same opinion. The interlocutor of the Sheriff is an able one; but I am satisfied that the connexion of the petitioner with the bankrupt was not such as the statute contemplates by the words "connected with his business." Any customer of a party, or any one having dealt with him, might be subjected to examination, if the petitioner could be so. I am clearly of opinion that these words cannot be meant to include every body who has had dealings with the bankrupt, or else every one of his creditors might be examined.

LORD MACKENZIE.—The question which is made out against the petitioner is one of mere suspicion only; and that suspicion is not of his being connected with the bankrupt's business, but of having obtained undue preferences from him. But these are not grounds for holding him subject to the statutory examination.

LORD BALGRAY was absent.

THE COURT found that the petitioner could not be examined; but refused to find him entitled to expenses.

Clunie v.
Drysdale.

Filiation—Semiplena Probatio—Witness.—1. Evidence in an action of filiation which held insufficient to warrant the pursuer's oath in supplement. 2. In such action, the pursuer's sister held not admissible as a witness, except for the purpose of corroborating the testimony of other witnesses, in defect of other evidence. 3. Circumstances in which additional proof refused to be allowed.

THE advocate, Janet Clunie, was delivered of a natural child on the 26th July, 1828, and she thereafter brought an action of filiation before the Sheriff of Perth, against the respondent, Drysdale, who denied the paternity of the child. In May, 1830, Drysdale emitted a declaration to the effect, inter alia, that he and Clunie were neighbours, and had been long acquainted; that on one occasion, about the beginning of 1822, when the parties were together in the house of one Bennet, a person present proposed to marry them; that he heard that another person was sent to the door to proclaim them, but that "he does not recollect being in bed with Clunie on that occasion;" that about the end of 1824, or beginning of 1825, they had been alone for about an hour, between nine and ten of the evening, in a public-house in Perth, kept by one Robertson, where they had some spirits together, and that this was the only occasion on which they had been together in a public-house.

2D DIVISION.
Lord Jeffrey.

The Sheriff having allowed a proof, it appeared in evidence that, about two years after the proceedings in Bennet's house alluded to in the above declaration, Clunie attempted unsuccessfully, before the Commissary Court, to make out a marriage with Drysdale; that the parties had been subsequently seen occasionally together, but not in suspicious circumstances; and that, in the year 1827, they had been upwards of an hour together in a public-house in Perth, kept by Donald Robertson.

The pursuer having tendered her sister as a witness, and proposed to examine her as to circumstances alleged to have taken place between the pursuer and defender, not previously spoken to by other witnesses, and within her sole knowledge, the Sheriff refused to allow her to be examined, except in corroboration of the testimony of other witnesses.

The Sheriff, on advising the proof, considering it not to amount to a semiplena probatio, refused Janet Clunie her oath in supplement; whereupon she brought an advocacy, and pleaded, that the evidence adduced was sufficient to entitle her to her oath; and that her sister was, under the circumstances, a competent witness, and ought to have been received; and she farther offered to adduce additional proof.

Drysdale, on the other hand, pleaded, that the pursuer had failed in her proof, and that the Sheriff's judgment was right; that the evidence of the sister was inadmissible as a witness to independent facts—a step—

James v. Dymally.

The Lord Ordinary remitted simpliciter to the Sheriff, but found no expenses due; adding to his interlocutor the note subjoined. Chambers reclaimed, craving at all events to be allowed an additional proof.

Lord Justice Clerk.—I cannot think there are sufficient grounds for granting the oath in supplement. As to admitting the evidence of the sister, it would be a dangerous precedent. Humphry v. Aitken is a strong case upon that point. It would be dangerous to encourage the notion that a sister's evidence was admissible, except for the purpose of corroborating the testimony of another witness. There may be grounds for suspicion, but we must have evidence to warrant the oath in supplement.

Lord Meadowbank.—I have some doubts. If I could hold that there was Humphry v. Aitken, Feb. 18, 1822 (1 Shaw's Appeals, 111).

The Lord Ordinary gives this judgment with some hesitation, especially as to the admission of further evidence offered by the advocate. The weight of the case against the respondent is in the evidence afforded by his own declaration as to the former connexion between the parties in 1824; and though there can be but little doubt as to the import of a man's statement that 'he cannot recollect' whether he had been in bed with a woman who pursued a declarator of marriage against him, within a few months after that transaction, it might still be desirable to have the truth of the matter ascertained by the testimony of impartial witnesses. The Lord Ordinary is of opinion, therefore, that the evidence as to this point was not incompetent, and the chief reason why he does not remit, in order to have it taken, is, that even assuming the intimacy between the parties at that time to have gone the full length of carnal intercourse, this, with the other circumstances as the proof now stands, would scarcely amount to semplicita probatio of a paternity induced by acts in 1827.

"If the sister's evidence were admissible, the case might be clear enough; and the Lord Ordinary would be well pleased if he could think himself at liberty to receive it. But he can find no authority to warrant so great a relaxation of the rigorous rule which has hitherto prevailed as to the unsupported evidence of near relations.

"The defect in the advocate's case is the total want of any proof of intercourse, or meetings of any kind, about the time of the child's conception, and the estrangement which plainly followed her unsuccessful attempt to make out a marriage with the respondent in 1824. On the other hand, the Lord Ordinary thinks it sufficiently made out that the respondent's declaration is false in several particulars, and inclines especially to hold the meeting at Robertson's to have been in 1827. If it be assumed that the parties had illicit intercourse in 1824, very slight indications of familiarity will justify a belief that this had been resumed, even after an interval of alienation; and, when no other paramour is indicated, and there is nothing in the circumstances of the party accused to tempt the woman to a false accusation, the cause of truth may be more endangered by refusing than by admitting her oath in supplement; especially as in giving that oath she is not so much swearing in her own cause, as in that of an infant, in whom some other person must have as great an interest as she has.

"Those are the grounds of the Lord Ordinary's hesitation: But still, being of opinion that the judgment of the Sheriff is in accordance with the course of decisions, he has felt it his duty to confirm it."

sufficient evidence of the meeting in Robertson's having taken place in 1827; I should be rather inclined to allow the oath. No. 122.

LORD MEDWYN.—I am quite satisfied that we should adhere to the interlocutor. As to the nister's evidence, I agree with the judgment of the Sheriff, that the only case in which any deviation should be allowed from the rule of the inadmissibility of such a witness, is for the purpose of corroborating a particular important fact sworn to by another witness, where it was not possible to have other evidence. The proof was led in 1831, and it is too late now to propose to tender new evidence. As to the evidence before us, the principle to be applied in considering it is, that there must be something more than suspicion, though less than proof; but I do not think the evidence amounts to this. There is no appearance of their having been any improper familiarity.

LORD GLENLEE was absent.

THE COURT accordingly adhered, but found no expenses due.

No. 123.

Writ—Erasure—Settlement.—A settlement of a heritable estate was made by three relative deeds—(1) a deed of entail, containing a disposition to certain heirs, "whom failing, to any persons to be named by the entailer, in any nomination to be executed by him at any time of his life;" (2) a relative deed of nomination of heirs, in the form of a probative writ, which excluded the nearest heir, and declared the order of heirs who were called, but contained no dispositive words; and (3) a trust-disposition for certain temporary purposes, under burden of which, the other two deeds were granted: These deeds were all executed on the same day, and a duplicate of each deed was executed at the same time; the testing clause of each deed specially referred to the simultaneous execution of the duplicate, and vice versa; there were numerous erasures and superinductions in the deeds and duplicates, but, with two immaterial exceptions, no erasure occurred in the same place of both the deed and its duplicate, the deed being entire wherever the duplicate was erased, and vice versa; no notice of the erasures was taken in the testing clause of any of the deeds or duplicates; Held, in a reduction (1) That the deeds were, in the circumstances, unchallengeable; and (2) That the combined effect of the disposition in the entail, and of the relative deed of nomination of heirs, was, to form an effectual conveyance in favour of these heirs, just as if they had been originally inserted in the entail.

At the death of the late John, Earl of Strathmore, his trustees, under a private settlement, entered on the possession of his Scottish estates. The settlement on which they founded, consisted of the following deeds: 1st, A deed of entail (under burden of the trust-disposition in their favour), bearing date December 15th, 1815, which disposed the barony and lordship of Glamis and his Lordship's other Scottish estates, in favour of himself and his issue in a certain order, "whom failing, to any person or persons to be named by him in any nomination, or other writ-

 Earl of Strathmore v. Earl of Strathmore's trustees.

(2) A deed of nomination of heirs, dated the same day, and referring to the entail and the reserved power of nominating, whereby his Lordship excluded his brother, the Hon. Thomas Bowes, and John Lyon of Hetton House, and his brother Charles Lyon, from the succession, and appointed another series of heirs. This deed was in the form of a Scottish probative writ. (3) A trust-disposition of his Lordship's estates, referring to the deeds of entail, and nomination of heirs, and conveying the lands to James Farrer and others, as trustees, who were directed to hold the lands for thirty years after his Lordship's death, and on certain contingencies, for some time longer, during which period they were to apply the accumulated rents in purchasing and entailing other lands.

On the same day when these three deeds were signed, Lord Strathmore also executed three duplicate deeds, purporting to be of the same tenor. The testing clause of each of the deeds in both sets referred to the contemporaneous execution of a duplicate, in the same manner as in the following example, taken from the testing clause of one of the duplicate deeds of entail. “In witness whereof I have subscribed this and the forty preceding pages of stamped paper, written by John Muir, apprentice to James Dundas, clerk to the signet, together with a duplicate hereof, written by James Sutherland, also apprentice to the said James Dundas, at Edinburgh, the 15th day of December, 1815, before these witnesses, James MacAlpine, clerk to the said James Dundas, the said John Muir, writer hereof, and William Wilson, clerk to the signet.”

Shortly before his Lordship's death, he executed a deed, adding another person to the number of his trustees. His Lordship died without lawful issue, in 1820, and immediately after his death, the trustees put one set of the deeds upon record, retaining the other set in their own custody. An action to reduce the whole deeds was raised by Thomas, now Earl of Strathmore, who pleaded chiefly that as they rendered him destitute, though a Peer of the realm, and as they provided for an excessive accumulation of rents, they were contra bonos mores and against sound policy. The Court sustained the defences, and assoilzied.<sup>1</sup> This judgment was affirmed on appeal.<sup>2</sup>

Afterwards his Lordship raised a new action of reduction libelling that the deeds were “fabricated, simulated and devised; of false dates, not properly tested, and want, or are defective in, the solemnities required by law; and in particular, that the said deeds, which are alleged to constitute the settlement of the said John Bowes Lyon, late Earl of Strathmore, have been vitiated and altered, in substantialibus, after the alleged execution thereof; that numerous important passages, as they originally stood, have been erased and obliterated, and new and different passages have been fabricated, and simulately inserted in their place; that no fewer than 160 such erasures and new insertions have been executed on the alleged settlement; and that, in particular, various of the lands conveyed, as they now appear ex facie of the deeds, have been so simulately inserted on erasures, as well as passages affecting the destination of heirs, and the duration of the trust thereby created.”

A plea of res judicata being stated by the defenders in bar of this action, it was repelled by the Court.<sup>1</sup> The defenders then satisfied the production by lodging the recorded deeds, and also the duplicate deeds under seal. The Lord Ordinary appointed defences on the merits, and “remitted to Thomas Thomson, Esq., deputy clerk register, to open the sealed packet now put into process by the defenders, and that in presence of the parties, or their respective counsel or agents, and to report to the Lord Ordinary as to the particular state and appearance of the deeds therein contained, in so far as regards erasures and interlineations, and, thereafter, again to seal up the said packet, to be disposed of in terms of any future order of the Lord Ordinary, or the Court.” A report was returned under this order. In their defences the defenders stated that the deeds were in all respects genuine and authentic; and that no erasure occurred in substantialibus, so as to have affected their validity, even if only one set of deeds had been executed, but still less were any of the erasures material where there were duplicate deeds. And they alleged that although there were erasures in the duplicate deeds also, yet, with two immaterial exceptions, the whole words written on erasures in the recorded deeds, were free of erasure in the duplicate deeds, and, vice versa, the words written on erasure in the duplicate deeds, were free of erasure in the recorded deeds. So that both deeds must have been in their present state when signed in duplicate.

In preparing a record, and before preparing the condescendence, the pursuer moved for leave to make a farther inspection of the deeds, with the aid of persons of skill, whose names were stated in a notice served on the defenders. The defenders insisted that this motion could only be allowed under such precautions as should protect the deeds against all hazard from further erasure by any party. The Lord Ordinary (Moncrieff) “allowed the pursuer, by his agent and any of his counsel, with the assistance of any one of the other persons mentioned in the notice, such person to be specified in the intimation herein after mentioned, to inspect and examine the deeds under reduction, and also the duplicates thereof at present sealed up, and for that purpose remitted to Mr Thomson, deputy clerk register, to open the parcel as sealed up by him, and at such time and place as he may appoint; and in presence of the clerk of this process to allow inspection and examination of the said deeds; but expressly, that no experiment of any kind shall be allowed to be made on the paper, or the ink of the said deeds; and that after said inspection and examination, the deeds shall be reenclosed and sealed, to await farther orders of the Lord Ordinary and the Court, and appointing the pursuer to give intimation to the defender's agents, of the time and place appointed for examination of the deeds, at least forty-eight hours before it is to take place. But the Lord Ordinary, in the present state of this process, refused the motion of the pursuer to any greater or wider extent."

* * * NOTE.—In case the pursuer should be dissatisfied with this order, it is necessary to explain the very peculiar circumstances of this cause.

The pursuer insists for reduction of the deeds called for, merely on the ground that they 'have been vitiated and altered in substantialibus after the alleged execution thereof.' The principal deeds were in the public register, and they have been transmitted to the clerk of the process, under a warrant from the Court. At this time was done, the defenders put into process a sealed packet, which they stated contained duplicates of the same deeds, executed but not recorded, and they moved the Lord Ordinary to make some order by which the precise state of both sets of deeds, in respect of vitiations or alterations might be ascertained, for the future guidance of the Court. The Lord Ordinary made a remit to Mr Thomson, the deputy clerk register, first, with regard to the deeds in the sealed packet, and afterwards with regard to the recorded deeds; and the first remit was specially to 'open the sealed packet now put into process by the defenders, and that in presence of the parties, or their respective counsel and agents,' and 'to report to the Lord Ordinary as to the particular state and appearance of the deeds therein contained, in so far as regards erasures and interlineations,' &c., and thereafter to re-seal the packets, to be disposed of by the Lord Ordinary or the Court. These interlocutors were acquiesced in, and the deeds having been very minutely examined, Mr Thomson made a full and very special report as to the state of each deed.

"The parties then proceeded to prepare a record in the cause, and a condescendence and answers have been lodged.

"In this state of the cause the pursuer makes a motion for a further inspection of the deeds, before revising his condescendence. To this there may be no objection, if it be regularly conducted and guarded. But at first the pursuer refused to give any specification of the person to whose inspection he wished the deeds to be laid open, and insisted that the order should be made without limitation. The Lord Ordinary having required him to specify the persons, beyond his counsel and agent, whom he proposed to employ; the notice now produced was given, and it was manifest from the four last names in the list, that the intention is to set, not one, but various engravers and other persons, assumed to be scientific, to an inspection and sifting of these writs at this stage of the process.

"It will be particularly observed, 1st, That these deeds have never yet been seen by the Lord Ordinary or the Court.

"2d, That the remit was made with the consent of both parties for ascertaining the present state of the deeds.

"3d, That the report was made by the person, undoubtedly the very best qua-

An inspection of the deeds was then made by the pursuer's agent, aided by Mr. Lizars, engraver. No. 12

The pursuer raised a supplementary reduction of the duplicate deeds, on the ground of their being erased in substantialibus, which action was conjoined with the first. As parties were still at issue respecting the number and extent of the erasures, a new remit was made of consent by the Lord Ordinary (Cockburn) to Cosmo Innes, advocate, to inspect the deeds, and "report on the whole erasures." He drew up a report from which it appeared that, in the recorded deed of entail there were forty-two entire words, in various places, written on erasures; and sixty-two letters, or syllables, also in various places, written on erasures. Among all these the only erasure and superinduction which also occurred in the duplicate deed of entail, was in a part of the name of a parcel of lands called Younies, composing a portion of the barony of Glammiss. The description of the whole lands was contained in a procuratory of resignation, and in both deeds the words "all and whole the lands, ancient barony, lordship and thanedom of Glammiss," were free of erasure. These words were immediately succeeded by the following clause: "comprehending the mains and town of Glammiss; the town and lands of Balnagoon, Myreton, Easter and Wester Younies, Arnafool, &c." In the recorded entail the letters Yo, in Younies, were written on an erasure; in the unrecorded duplicate, the letters You were written on an erasure; and the same partial erasure also occurred in the trust-disposition and its duplicate.

Trustees

The pursuer pleaded that this erasure was fatal, at least to the portion of lands affected by it. The defenders answered (1) that there was a valid conveyance of the whole barony of Glammiss, of which these lands were only a parcel, and within which they were included, even though not specified; (2) that the erasure was too minute to be material, enough lified, at least in the present instance, and that it was most minute and particular.

"4th, That although the inspection was ordered to be made in presence of the pursuer and his agent, it is not averred in the condescendence lodged, that there are any erasures or vitiations other than those reported.

"Nevertheless, it is possible that things may be omitted, and the pursuer might be entitled to a further inspection before revising, though the Lord Ordinary must confess that he should not approve of a multitude of counsel and agents being brought to such a business; and by the above interlocutor, the Lord Ordinary, though with hesitation, has allowed him to take the assistance of one other person whom he may suppose to have particular skill. But what he particularly objects to is, the attempt to bring such a number of such persons to such an inspection, at the present moment, whereby a conflict of opinions, founded, as the Court well know, very often, on mere imagination, may be raised as to the actual state of the deeds. He owns that he was not without fear that experiments were contemplated. At any rate, he has thought it necessary to guard against it; and, on the whole, he thinks the interlocutor gives the pursuer the utmost latitude which he can possibly expect in the present state of the cause; what may be thought necessary at this point."

23. of the words "Easter and Wester Younies" being free of erasure, to identify this parcel of the barony, as being contained in the settlement; and (3) there was a separate general clause conveying the whole Scottish heritage of which the entailer should be possessed at his death, which was free from challenge, and must have embraced this parcel of lands, even had it not otherwise been conveyed.

In regard to the other erasures which occurred in the recorded deed and not in the duplicate, a great number of them were obviously trivial, and one of the most important seemed to be the following. Resignation was directed to be made for new infeftment to the granter, and the heirs male of his body "successively, in order, according to their respective seniorities, and the heirs male respectively to be procreated of their bodies successively, whom failing, to the heirs whatsoever lawfully to be procreated of the bodies of my said heirs male successively in order according to their seniority, and the heirs whatsoever respectively to be procreated of their bodies respectively, whom failing" to the heirs whatsoever of his lordship's body, &c. The words in italics were written on erasures, and the pursuer contended that as they affected the destination of the estates, they were necessarily in substantialibus. The defenders answered (1) that the same passage in the duplicate deed was free of erasure; (2) that the whole of this destination was repeated in the deed of nomination of heirs, and was free from erasure there; and (3) that, in themselves the erasures did not substantially affect the destination.

In the duplicate deed of entail the number of erasures, including all those which were obviously insignificant, was not much less than in the recorded entail. The following seemed to be among the more important of the erasures in this writ. The deed disposed inter alia, "the burgh of barony after mentioned, erected by King Charles II. conform to a charter under the Great Seal, in favour of the deceased Patrick Earl of Strathmore, therein designed Earl of Kinghorn, dated at Whitehall the thirtieth day of May, 1672;" and a large portion of the contents of the charter containing the burgh of barony of Glamis, &c., was there recited. The reporter (Cosmo Innes) in pointing out the erasure in the latter half of the word "thirtieth," also added that it had been first written "thirteen."

The pursuer objected that this erasure, being in the date of the charter, which was inter essentialia, showed that a different charter must have been originally referred to, and not the charter as now described; and accordingly that the burgh of barony, &c., contained in the charter was not duly comprehended in the disposition. The defenders answered (1) that the date of the charter was free of erasure in the recorded deed; (2) that the charter was identified by the name of the granter, and grantee, the place where it was granted, and the month and year in which it was granted, besides the recital of a large portion of its contents; that there was no other charter in May, 1672; that it was thus sufficiently identified, and that this was all that was required.—Another erasure occurred in the clause by which, after specially enumerating the whole lands conveyed, a general disposition was added of the whole lands within Scotland, which pertained to the granter then or at his death. The deed disposed these together with all right or interest which his lordship had or could pretend to the “earldom, &c., lands, baronies, &c., teinds, fishings and other heri*tages herein particularly and generally before disposed, or to any portion of the same*” to be resigned in the hands of the granter’s immediate superiors, &c. The pursuer objected that the words in italics, which were superinduced on erasures, were inter essentialia. The defenders answered, (1) the words were free of erasure in the duplicate entail; and (2) they were surplusage, as the rest of the deed was in all respects as effectual without them.—Again, in the destination of the estate, after all the heirs, called in the deed of nomination and certain posterior substitutions, were exhausted, the estates were to devolve in the last place, on the granter’s “heirs whatsoever, and their assignees, the eldest heir female and the descendants of her body always excluding heirs portioners, &c.” The pursuer contended that the two words and the letter in italics, being written on erasures were a fatal nullity. The defenders answered (1) that the recorded duplicate was free of erasure in this passage; (2) that the erasure could only affect one member of the destination, which was the most remote of any, and that the pursuer was cut off from all interest in it; and (3) that it was not in itself a material erasure, being supported and explained by the context.

In the recorded deed of nomination of heirs, the narrative clause referred to the deed of entail as having disposed the lands “for new infeftment of the same to be granted to myself,” &c. It then stated the destination as set forth in the entail, and referred to the trust-disposition; after which it declared the granter’s resolution to exclude the Hon. Thomas Bowes, and John and Charles Lyon, “from ever succeeding to my said estates.” It then proceeded, “I do therefore hereby declare and appoint, that, in case of the failure of heirs whatsoever of my body, and the heirs of their bodies, my said lands and estates shall devolve and belong to the heirs male lawfully procreated or to be procreated of the body of the said Thomas Bowes successively in their order, and the heirs male respectively to be procreated of their bodies successively, whom failing, to the persons having right for the time to the titles of Earl of Strathmore, &c., other than and except the said Thomas Bowes, John Lyon, and Charles Lyon, all and each of whom are specially excluded and debarred from ever succeeding to or enjoying my said lands,” &c. A declaration followed, in favour of a certain class of heirs, in the course of which a clause occurred “excluding and excepting always the said Thomas Bowes, John Lyon, and Charles Lyon,” as to whom it was declared that after, “none of whom shall ever succeed to or enjoy my said lands or any part thereof, and who are all and each specially excluded in the subsequent clause of the destination, calling the heirs made on whatever of the grantor the words occurred, as distinctly always the said Thomas Botwell, John Lyon, and Charles Lyon. The words or syllables, in the above quotations, so far as printed in italics, were written on erasures. The pursuer contended that these were in essential, and that he was not effectually cut off from the succession. The defender answered that even if there had been no duplicate deed of nomination, the erasures were of no importance, considering the context of the deeds, and that, as no corresponding erasure existed in the duplicate, this was an additional, though an unnecessary, corroboration of the recorded deed. vi

In the unrecorded duplicate deed of nomination of heirs, the erasures were apparently less worthy of notice than those which have just been specified in the recorded deed. In reference to the terms of this deed of nomination the pursuer pleaded, as a separate reason of reduction, that, as he was not cut off from the succession by the deed of entail, if taken by itself, so he could not effectually be cut off by the deed of nomination as it contained no dispositive words. The defenders answered that the entail contained an apt disposition, hæredibus nominatis, and that it was unnecessary, in a deed of nomination which related to the entail and the reserved power of nomination, to insert any dispositive words whatever. In the recorded trust-disposition and its duplicate the number and character of the erasures were generally of a similar sort to those already specified. In the narrative of the deed, after referring to the entail and the deed of nomination, the grantor also referred to his having “already executed a will of my estates and property situated in England;” after which he proceeded to dispoise the Scottish estates in trust as already mentioned. The words in italics, which were superinduced on a comparatively large erasure, were the only words which were erased both in the recorded trust-deed, and in the duplicate. The defenders pleaded that they were altogether immaterial. As to the other superinductions on erasures, the grounds upon which each was attacked and defended were similar to those already noticed, with this difference that the defenders farther pleaded, as to the trust-deed, that as the pursuer was completely debarred from the succession by the combined effect of the entail and the deed of nomination of heirs, he had no interest or title to challenge the validity of the trust-deed.

The pursuer did not apparently rely so much on any one erasure, as on the number of erasures, great and small, occurring in the deeds. In reference to the erasures, he pleaded in general, 1st, that they, or at least some of them, occurred in substantialibus; and 2d, that if any deed was invalid, in respect of erasures in substantialibus; that deed could not be rendered valid by the production of any duplicate deed, which was free of erasures. Such duplicate might be valid in itself, if free of erasures, but it could not cure another deed which was in itself invalid on account of erasures in substantialibus. It therefore followed, that, in judging of the validity of each deed, it must be tried without reference to the duplicate, and must stand or fall on its own merits alone; and in afterwards trying the validity of its duplicate, that duplicate must be also examined by itself; because, if it was invalid, on account of erasures, it could not effectually support another invalid deed.

The defenders pleaded. 1st. That the partial erasure of a word is not necessarily fatal even to that word itself, especially where it was apparent that no other word, capable of giving a different meaning to the sentence had been originally written on the erased space.<sup>1</sup> 2d. That even where an erasure was more extensive, still, if it occurred in an unimportant part of the deed, or if the words superinduced gave a consistent meaning to the clause in which they occurred, and were supported by the context of the deed, the erasure produced no nullity.<sup>2</sup> 3d. That where a deed consisted of distinct parts, an erasure, even if creating a nullity in one part, did not necessarily affect the validity of the rest.<sup>3</sup> And 4th. That as each of the three deeds, referred, in gremio of its testing clause, to the duplicate which was simultaneously executed, that was tantamount to a statement in the testing clause that every word, written on an erasure in the deed, and written free of erasure in the duplicate, was written on erasure prior to signature of the deed and duplicate; and that this alone did as distinctly point out the whole erasures, with two immaterial exceptions,* to have been executed prior to signature, as the most express enumeration of erasures in the testing clause would have done.<sup>4</sup> By applying these rules to the deeds, the defenders contended that their validity was unchallengeable; and as the case was free from every suspicion of fraud, and was a mere case of erasure not authenticated in the testing clause, they were entitled to the most favourable application of these rules.<sup>5</sup>

* NOTE.—"The remit to Mr Innes was made before answer, and of consent, with an order to him 'to report on the whole erasures,' and on the parties 'to print the deeds in such a form as to show the whole erasures therein.' Mr Innes reported; and the deeds were so printed; and not only have no objections been lodged, but, until the debate had begun, no proposal or expression of any desire to object was hinted. In these circumstances, the Lord Ordinary holds the report, which is by a person of skill in his own department, to be conclusive; and he does so the more readily, 1st, Because a final reference to such a person was almost a matter of necessity in the circumstances of the case, where the erasures are said to be about 460, and where the judges of each of these were certainly to be five, and might be thirteen, each of whom, if there was to be no final report, would have been obliged to form his separate opinion of each erasure and alleged erasure. 2dly, Because his clear impression, at the time of making the remit, was, that it was understood that the report was to be held on all sides as fixing the facts.

"Upon the merits, the case is very peculiar in two particulars. 1st, In the unusual number of erasures. 2d, In the means which the granter has afforded of enabling the law to dispose of these by an unusual number of relative and inseparably connected deeds.

"The erasures being so numerous, and the pursuer professing to make a point of almost every one of them, it is impossible for the Lord Ordinary to state his opinion of them in detail. He can only say, in general, that the conclusions he has come to, depend on the following views:—

"1st. That a very great number, nearly the whole, of the passages objected to are plainly immaterial, consisting of words, syllables, or letters, which have obviously been written on erasures, merely in order to correct palpable clerical errors, a misspelling, or such other accidents, and the entire omission of which parts of the deeds would create no doubt of the granter's meaning, or of its due expression, especially considering that some of them occur in parts of the deed which are merely narrative, or which only describe the contents of the other deeds, or in which the necessity of absolute accuracy is superseded by the use of general terms or directions.

"2d. That though there be passages of more importance, which it is possible may, in given circumstances, hereafter supersede, or otherwise affect detached portions of some, or of all of these deeds, at the instance of the pursuer, or of any other party entitled to found on these defects, there is none of them which so vitiates any of the deeds in substantialibus, as that reduction is the necessary legal consequence; even though each particular deed challenged were to be looked at by itself.

"3d. But none of these deeds can so be looked at, because the trust, the entail, and the nomination of heirs form one general settlement; and, having been executed in duplicate, all in one day, and all bearing express reference to each other, it is competent, when each erasure is excepted to, to throw any explanatory light upon it that can be obtained from these other writings, signed by the granter, in relation to that very passage, as to every passage of the deed challenged; and that this reference from the one to the other is peculiarly competent and peculiarly conclusive as to the general averment made by the pursuer in the record, that important words have been obliterated, and different words inserted after subscription—of these there has been no proof beyond what the deeds themselves afford; and when the whole are taken into view, they negative the assertion.

Both parties reclaimed, the pursuer on the merits, and the defenders No. 12 as to the award of expenses.

The Court ordered Cases, on considering which the following Opinions were delivered :—

Feb. 1, 181
Earl of Sarmore v. Ea
Scrathmore
Trustees.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I entertain some doubt whether there is sufficient evidence before us to certiorate us that these erasures were actually made before the execution of the deed, and not after it. Whether they are of greater or less importance, I conceive that no party was entitled to make them after the deed was once executed. They are above 200 in number in either set of deeds. They are not noticed in the testing-clause in any of the deeds. And in one of the deeds there is an erasure regarding the destination of the estates. Undoubtedly, it might be said that the effect of that erasure must, in any event, be limited to the single member of the destination, in which it occurs. But still I should have wished those doubts set at rest, respecting the date of these alterations, many of which appear plainly of small importance, but none of which could be made, after the execution of the deed, without the utmost danger to its validity.

LORD GILLIES.—Until I see at least one erasure in substantialibus pointed out, I cannot perceive any difficulty in disposing of this case. I own that I have no favourable leaning towards a settlement of this description, the purpose of which is to accumulate an immense fortune for the aggrandizement of a future generation, at the expense of privation to the present; just as little as I feel for those settlements which disinherit the natural heir for the purpose of founding largely endowed hospitals; but I cannot allow my own feelings to have the least influence upon the decision of this or any other question, and the sole subject for consideration here is, whether the deeds under reduction are good by the law of Scotland. I think they are so; and I must think so, until some one erasure in substantialibus be pointed out by the pursuer. A single one would be of far more importance than all which the learning and ingenuity of the pursuer have yet been able to instruct. It is true that the number of erasures is very great; but this is not a case where the rule "plura juvant" applies: and, therefore, if not one of all these erasures occurs in substantialibus, the whole taken together will not warrant the reduction of any of these deeds. I have perused the deeds without detecting such an erasure: the pursuer has hitherto failed to specify any such

"4th. That, even though effect were given to the whole erasures, to the extent of holding each erased passage as not written at all, this would not render the settlement either void or inoperative, and would at least leave enough to exclude the pursuer from demanding that total reduction which he now seeks, and upon which all his other conclusions depend.

"It is needless to refer to cases, because the abstract rules are clear; and almost the only general result of the decisions is, that, in their application, every case depends mainly on its peculiar circumstances. The Lord Ordinary may only observe, that there is no erasure here, than which one equally or more important cannot be shown to have been disregarded in a case at least as strong, and this even when there was no aid to be got from any collateral deed.

"But, although the pursuer be wrong, the Lord Ordinary gives him his costs hitherto incurred, because he was warranted, or rather tempted, to try the question, by what appeared on the very face of the instruments. He had better not speculate, however, on this indulgence being continued for ever."

1837. Erasure; and I must therefore decide upon the testing-clause, as such evidence exists. And there is a striking peculiarity in this case which confirms me strongly in the opinion that the defences ought to be sustained. The whole of the settlements, under challenge, were executed in duplicate. There were ten complete sets, each containing a series of these deeds, executed at the same time, the one being a duplicate of the other. And in the testing-clause of each deed, special reference is made to the duplicate signed of even date with it. The effect of this necessarily is to produce a much stronger assurance that the erasures were made prior to the execution of the deed, than any notice of them in the testing-clause of the deed, in common form, would have done. By the general practice, the testing-clause is not filled in till long after the date when the deed has been signed; and this does open the door to the hazard of erasures or marginal notes being specified in the testing-clause, if made before it was filled in, though perhaps made posterior to the signature of the deed. But in this case, the reference made in the testing-clause of each deed, to the execution of a duplicate, produces a stronger conviction, that the erasures were all of prior date to the signature of the deeds, because, with two immaterial exceptions, the whole erasures in the one deed occur in passages which are free of erasure in the other; and vice versa. But if it be alleged against the deed A that a certain word is written on an erasure, and the erasure is not noticed in the testing-clause, and must therefore be presumed to have been made subsequently to the signature, it appears to me that the answer is conclusive, that the testing-clause of deed A refers to the execution of a duplicate deed B, of the same date, in which deed B the suspected word is written free of erasure, and is therefore of unimpeachable authenticity. But the whole of the words written on erasures, with two unimportant exceptions, have their authenticity thus conclusively vouched; and I think the reference in the testing-clause of the deed A, to the contemporaneous execution of the deed B, is at least as good an authentication of every passage containing an erasure in the deed A, which is de facto written fair and free from erasure in the deed B, as if the testing-clause of A had specially enumerated all such erasures, in the ordinary way. It attests the existence of a duplicate in which none of its own erasures occur; and which could not be a duplicate, unless all these erasures were made prior to the signature of the duplicate deed. The erased passages of the one duplicate are thus supported by the corresponding passages free of erasure in the other, and the effect is to strengthen both, as much as if the testing-clause of each had enumerated its own erasures.

I regret that we have not the assistance to-day of our respected brother, Lord Balgray, but I understand that his Lordship was of the same opinion with that which I have now expressed.

LORD MACKENZIE.—I am of the same opinion. In regard to cases where erasures occur in probative deeds, they may be considered under two classes; first, where forgery or fraudulent vitiation is alleged and proved; and, second, where such an element is altogether wanting. In the first class of cases the Court have sometimes inferred the total nullity of a deed, in odium corruptoris, where they would not have gone so far had the deed belonged to the second class. In the present instance, the deeds under challenge do not belong to the first, but to the second class of these cases. There is no proof, or allegation, or even suspicion of wilful or fraudulent interpolation or erasure. It is just the ordinary case, where erasures are found in a deed, and the question is raised how far they affect its authenticity. The existence of an erasure on the face of a deed, though not noticed in the testing clause, does not of itself afford any proof or certainty of a vitiation after the deed was signed. It just comes to this, that it was quite possible that the alteration was made after the deed was signed. There may indeed have been no such vitiation; the erasure may have been made before signing; but as the very end and purpose of a probative writ is to produce legal certainty, that end is pro tanto defeated by every such erasure, so far as that it at least may have been made after signing, and the Court must then look at the effect of such erasure, in case it had been so made. That effect may be to annul the instrument in whole, or in part, or it may be altogether immaterial. But in the case of simple erasure, apart from all suspicion of fraud, I know no case in which an erasure is allowed to produce total nullity, unless in its own nature it was such as, when taken along with the whole deed, amounted to a vitiation in substantialibus of the deed. The Court are obliged therefore to examine the nature of the erasures, and decide what is the effect of each and all of them. What then are the erasures which thus open the possibility of other words having stood there at the date of the signature of the deed? Are any of them such as thereby to infer the total or partial nullity of the deed? I have examined them with attention, and I have been unable to find any one which can annul any material part of the deed, and still less the whole of it. There is not one, I conceive, in substantialibus. And as to the mere numerical amount of erasures, each of which is immaterial, that may indeed affect the character of the deed so far as slovenliness is concerned, but it can have no effect on its validity. I am not sufficiently acquainted with the details of practice in conveyancers' offices, either at the present time or as at the date of these deeds, to be able to say how far the number of erasures in them is uncommon, or unusual. But whether they be so or not, if they are all immaterial, the mere number of them will not make up one error in substantialibus. There is no arithmetical proportion between erasures which are immaterial, and erasures which are material, by means of which a given number of the former shall be computed as tantamount to one of the latter. And it must be remembered that the case before the Court relates to the settlement of a party deceased, which must stand or fall according to its present form. If it were a deed of entail which came under our judicial cognizance in consequence of some Act of Parliament directing it to be framed at the sight of this Court, then the number of erasures, even immaterial in themselves, might fairly be pressed on our attention as a reason for our not giving our sanction to such a document, but requiring that it should be written out afresh and with greater care. But the case here is entirely different. The deeds must be taken as they stand; they are made and cannot be altered; and the sole question is, whether or not they are valid in law. And in reference to that question, I am unable to rest any legitimate effect upon the observation that the erasures are numerous. That is not enough. The question remains, whether there is so much as one erasure which, either per se, or from its connexion with others, is in substantialibus. If there had been such an erasure, I think the pursuer could not have failed to point it out. And my own examination of the deeds has not detected any such. Indeed the pursuer, in place of relying on any one erasure, has brought them forward in whole lines, like a regiment, in order to produce an impression. But in examining these we are bound to look at them, giving due effect to every legitimate aid which our law permits

123. to be founded on, in supporting words which are found on an erasure not authenticated by the testing-clause. The Lord Ordinary has alluded to some of the aids, and Lord Gillies has adverted to another, which I hold to be of the greatest possible importance; I mean the execution of the duplicate deeds, and the reliance which is made in the testing-clause of each deed to the co-temporary execution of a duplicate. The effect of the execution of the duplicate deed to all erasures in the first deed, which do not also occur in the second, and, versus, as to all erasures in the second which do not occur in the first, is just that these erasures must have been made, and the existing words superinduced them, before the deeds were signed. The testing-clause proves that they were agreed at the date of signing, otherwise they could not be duplicates of either. So far as one of these deeds remains free of erasure, it must of necessity have contained the same words from the first; and, therefore, any corresponding words written on erasure in the duplicate, which words make that duplicate agree with the deed first mentioned, must have been so written prior to signing because it could not otherwise have been the duplicate, at that date, which the testing-clause proves it to have been. This is substantially the same as if the testing-clause of one deed, in stating the other to be a duplicate, had stated all the words on erasures, occurring in itself, corresponding with words in the other deed, free of erasure, were written on erasures before signing; and had specified what those words were. Now, is it possible to doubt that, if the testing-clause of either deed had expressly enumerated and specified the erasures superinductions, the deed must have been duly authenticated? And the reference to the duplicate appears to be nearly tantamount to this, with the exception of such erasures as equally occur in both duplicates, and these are quite immaterial. On the whole, I consider the present to be a special case. I do not hold that the execution of duplicates is alone enough to save the deeds. But taking all the circumstances together, of which that is one of the most important, I consider the deeds to be unchallengeable. And in regard to each individual erasure, after looking carefully into the deeds, I think it may, in this particular case, be defended. I would therefore sustain the defences.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I have already mentioned the nature of the doubts which had occurred to me; but, in all the circumstances of the case, I hold that the erasures were not material.

On the pursuer's motion, their Lordships found the pursuer entitled to his expenses out of the trust-estate, observing that, in the circumstances, Lord Strathmore was naturally led to try this action, and that it should be tried at the cost of the trust.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Adhere to the interdict reclaimed against, and refuse the desire of both reclaiming notes, and the pursuer entitled to additional expenses, to be paid out of the trust fund."

Arbitration—Submission.—1. Where the agent of one of the parties to a submission, impetrates a decree-arbitral obreptione, and by improper and unfair procedure—Held that the decree is liable to reduction.—2. Circumstances in which this rule was applied.

In 1830 John Calder took a lease for nineteen years, of the lands of Feb. 1, 1831 Buxburn, from George Gordon of Buxburn, and entered into possession. He fell into arrears, and Gordon took out a sequestration against him, which Calder resisted, alleging that Gordon had failed to make implementation of obligations incumbent on him by the lease, so as to give rise to a claim of damages. Gordon stated his whole claims for rent and otherwise as exceeding £1500; Calder denied these, and stated his claim for damages, &c., and for improvements on the farm, &c., to exceed £950. It was agreed between the parties that Calder should renounce his tack as at January, 1833, and that the whole claims arising out of the lease, hinc inde, should be submitted to arbitration. A deed of submission was executed in favour of two arbiters, with power to name an oversman, and it was stipulated that Calder should immediately renounce possession of the land; and, farther, should quit the houses of the farm, within ten days after a final decree-arbitral was pronounced. Parties were heard by the arbiters, and written statements were lodged on both sides; and a remit was made, of consent, to persons of skill, to report on the state of the farm, the fences, the manure, &c. On considering the report and pleadings, the arbiters agreed as to the decision of some of the points of dispute, but not as to the whole, and they executed a devolution upon William Watson, Sheriff-substitute of Aberdeenshire. Parties were repeatedly heard before him, and a new remit was made by him to a land-surveyor, who returned a report as to the state of the farm, and alleged improvements on it by Calder; after which, the oversman personally inspected the farm. He then pronounced this order:—"6th September, 1833. The arbiter having heard parties' procurators, finds the sum due by John Calder to be £20 sterling, and ordains the said sum to be paid within fourteen days, with certification."

No payment was made in terms of this order, and after the lapse of a twelvemonth, during which the submission had been duly prorogated, the agent of Gordon wrote to Stronach, the agent of Calder, to transmit to him the proceedings in the submission. Stronach wrote in answer, on 17th September, 1834:—

"I now send you the proceedings in the submission between John Calder and Mr Gordon, with a note which the former proposes to lay before the arbiter, in consequence of an obvious error in Mr Gordon's

" Calder is prepared to prove, that 14 acres, 2 roods, 31 falls, were taken off by Mr Gordon in March, 1832, and were actually let by Mr Gordon to another tenant, so that, in place of having any thing to pay, Calder will have something considerable to receive from Mr Gordon."

Parties were at issue whether the " note" above referred to was a separate note inclosed within the letter, or was the statement in figures which was engrossed in the letter itself. A postscript was added to the letter, respecting an alleged account for £3, 18s., which was stated to be a farther sum to be still credited to Calder.

On 20th September, Gordon's agent sent the proceedings to the clerk in the submission, stating "as Calder has not paid the £20 found due by him to Mr Gordon, you will require to extend the decret-arbitral."

A decree-arbitral for the sum of £20 was accordingly extended on 7th October. On 16th October, Stronach wrote to Gordon's agent,—" You have placed me in a most awkward situation by applying for, and obtaining a decret-arbitral against John Calder, without having first communicated his note to the arbitrer; or, at any rate, advised me of your intention to apply for the decree. My object in sending you the papers on the 17th ultimo, in place of at once sending them to the arbitrer, as instructed by Calder, was to afford you an opportunity of reconsidering the matter, with a view to a private arrangement." l, that his whole proceedings had been regular and proper.
 der raised a reduction of the decree on various grounds, which ultiresolved into two, one of which was merely a question of error
 , in reference to the deduction of £3, 18s., as to which no judgwas given by the Court; the other was, that the oversman's order

September, 1833, was not final, but was subject to be recalled or l; and as the pursuer's agent, Stronach, had distinctly intimated to fender's agent, by his letter of 17th September, 1834, that the r required to be farther heard on various important points; and nt him a note of these along with the process, it was contrary to aith and fair procedure, on the part of the defender's agent, to send process to the clerk to the submission, and ask for a decree, with-en giving notice to the pursuer's agent, that he meant to oppose ther hearing, or that he was about to ask the decree to be extend-nd as he had also kept both the oversman and clerk in ignorance e pursuer required to be farther heard, they were thereby com-misled, so that a decree-arbitral was pronounced in circumstances h the oversman would not have pronounced it, had he not been the dark respecting them, and the defender had truly got the fraudulently, or obreptione, and was not entitled to avail himself any effect whatever. This was the more evident, as the whole ire had lain over for a year prior to the moment when the defend-ent took the sudden and irregular step of asking for decree in the stances just explained. It ought, therefore, to be set aside, and should be reponed against it, as if the submission had never been into.

defender answered:—The order of the oversman on 6th Septem-33, was final and irrevocable; at least it contained the deliberate f his judgment on the whole claims of parties, after they had been ard. It ordained payment in fourteen days; and, although the r had indulged the pursuer with a year's delay, that only strengths right to obtain a decree-arbitral in terms of the order, whenever dd apply to have it extended; and the pursuer had no right what-expect farther notice before this was done. In regard to the inof a desire to be farther heard, which was contained in the f 17th September, that imposed no duty upon the defender's take steps for this purpose, as it was the duty of the pursuer's agent, to do whatever was requisite for this, if he seriously desired the decree. And as the decree-arbitral was not extended till being about three weeks after the process was borrowed up

No. 124. by the defender's agent, Stronach, the pursuer's agent, had full opportunity to apply to be farther heard if he chose; and he could not fail to know the purpose for which the process was borrowed up by the defender's agent, and the necessity of there being a decree-arbitral extended without farther delay, especially as the pursuer had possession of the houses on the farm until ten days had expired after such decree was pronounced.

Ch. 1, 1837.
Calder v.
Gordon.

The Lord Ordinary "sustained the defences, assolvizied the defender, and decerned; and found the pursuer liable in expenses."*

The pursuer reclaimed.

LORD GILLIES.—I am very unwilling to touch a decree-arbitral, unless there be strong grounds for doing so, but I fear that I cannot take the same view of this case which the Lord Ordinary has done. I think the decree-arbitral has in this instance been obtained by dint of unseasonable and unseemly over-agency on the part of the defender, and that it cannot avail him, but must be set aside. Upon September 17, 1834, the pursuer's agent, Stronach, wrote a sensible and rational letter to the defender's agent, communicating a note of statements as to overcharges, of very considerable amount, which he distinctly intimated that Calder proposed to lay before the oversman. The defender's agent made no answer to that letter, and he gives no satisfactory explanation why he did not answer it. I think, however, it was entitled to an answer. But the case did not stop here. Within three days after receiving that letter, the defender's agent, without answering Stronach, or making the least intimation to him, wrote to the clerk of the submission—"As Calder has not paid the £20 found due by him to Mr Gordon, you will require to extend the decree-arbitral." In this communication he did not make the least reference to the intimation he had received from Stronach, and I think this was extremely improper. The defender's agent was bound, either to have answered Stronach's letter, and certiorated him of the course he was about to take in applying to have the decree-arbitral extended, or he ought to have transmitted Stronach's letter, containing the note of the alleged errors and overcharges, and the intimation of a desire for farther hearing, to the clerk of the submission, along with the process, so as to certiorate the oversman of its contents. But he

---

* "NOTE.—It was maintained, at the debate, against the decret-arbitral,—That it was obtained by fraud. The Lord Ordinary is of opinion, that there is nothing condescended on to warrant this charge. No fact is stated, except that of the agent of the pursuer having sent the agent of the defender a copy of a note, 'which the former (the pursuer) proposes to lay before the arbiter.' The latter, three or four days thereafter, asked the clerk to extend the decree, the nature of which the arbiter had previously indicated, and this was done. The fraud consists in the defender's agent not having lodged the paper which his adversary said that he (the adversary) was to lodge; and the application for the extension of the decree is described in the pursuer's Condescendence (Art. 16), as 'secret communications with the clerk.' It was not the duty or the right of the defender's agent to lodge the pursuer's papers, and being told that this one was to be lodged by the pursuer himself, the defender was perfectly entitled to ask for the decree. Besides, the pursuer had ample opportunity of being heard, and to all appearance was fully heard, either on his note or on any thing he chose, after all this."

refrained from doing either of these things. And it appears that, immediately after the decree was extended, Stronach wrote what seems to me to be also a sensible letter, complaining of the undue advantage which had been taken, and stating, "My object in sending you the papers on the 17th ultimo, in place of at once sending them to the arbiter, as instructed by Calder, was to afford you an opportunity of reconsidering the matter, with a view to a private arrangement." And then he intimates, he is satisfied that the oversman would not have given decree without a farther hearing of parties had he known the facts which were kept back by Gordon's agent. That letter appears to me to afford a satisfactory explanation of the whole proceeding, and I have no doubt it states what is an adequate, and a true reason for the course followed by Stronach, in his communication of 17th September, with the defender's agent. The answer of the defender's agent is not at all satisfactory to my mind. And in the whole circumstances I feel myself warranted to suspect, and constrained to believe, that the oversman was led to pronounce a decree while some circumstances were wilfully kept back from him by the defender's agent, which he was bound to have communicated (or at least to have certiorated the pursuer if he did not), and that in this way a decree was improperly impetrated by the defender. I think that decree must, in the special circumstances of the case, be set aside.

LORD MACKENZIE.—I think the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor should be altered. The defender's agent sent to the pursuer's agent for the process, and he received it along with a note, containing a statement, which, it was intimated, was intended to be laid before the oversman. Parties are at issue whether the letter contained a separate note included within it, or whether the statement engrossed in it was the "note" referred to. I rather think, if I must make a guess, that the latter is the more probable supposition; and I shall take it so, which is putting it on the weakest footing for the pursuer's present reduction. But even in that view, I think the subsequent decree was obtained by nimious and unfair procedure, and must be opened up. It is certainly a difficult thing to open up a decree-arbitral; but it would be a very serious thing for the country, if a decree-arbitral which had been obtained by unfair means, could not be set aside. Now assuming that there was no separate note included in the letter of the pursuer's agent, still I am satisfied that the statement in that letter which was transmitted along with the process was just meant to be handed over to the clerk to the submission along with the process. But in place of this, the defender's agent kept back that statement, at the same time that he transmitted the process, and asked for a decree-arbitral to be immediately extended. I cannot think that a procedure like that, was either safe or admissible, while he neither gave notice on the one hand to the pursuer's agent that his note was not forwarded to the clerk, though the process was, nor, on the other hand, to the clerk, that such a note was in existence, and was withheld by him. I think such conduct decidedly amounted to over-agency; to erroneous, and substantially incorrect and improper agency. What effect the note would have had on the oversman if it had been laid before him, whether great or small, I cannot tell. But the decree-arbitral must be opened up if this Court holds that the arbiter was led, by the undue proceedings of one party, to issue a decree without affording to the other a due hearing, or opportunity of being heard, in reference to the note in question. I think we can do nothing but reduce the decree.

LORD PATERSON.—I am of the same opinion. I think in all the circumstances the decree was obtained obreptione. Considering the terms of the letter

Calder v.

Gordon.

No. 124. of the pursuer's agent, of 17th September, I think the defender's agent, in returning the process to the clerk to the submission, as he had not answered the letter of the pursuer's agent, was bound not to have asked for a decree-arbitral, without certiorating the oversman, through the clerk to the submission, of the note referred to in the letter of 17th September. Whether there was any separate note in that letter or not, is quite immaterial. If there was no separate note, the letter itself should have been transmitted along with the process, to the clerk to the submission, as the defender's agent had made no answer to that letter, and given no intimation to the pursuer's agent that he was to apply for the issuing of a decree. I think there was gross precipitation, to say the least, in demanding a decree under these circumstances; and as it was obtained by a party who at the same time kept the oversman in the dark as to the fact of the note being in existence, while he gave no intimation to the opposite party that his note was withheld from the oversman, I think it was obtained by undue means, and must be reduced.

THE COURT altered the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, and reduced the decree, and awarded expenses in favour of the pursuer.

Process.—Held unnecessary, in respect of A. S. 11th July, 1828, § 77, to append a copy of the summons in a process of multiplepinding, to a reclaiming note presented by one of the claimants.

Feb. 2, 1837. In a process of multiplepinding a judgment was pronounced, against 1st Division. which a party, named Higgins, presented a reclaiming note. When moved in Court,

The Dean of Faculty, for the competing claimant, objected that the note was incompetent, in respect that no copy of the summons was appended to it.

LORD MACKENZIE.—This matter is regulated by the 77th section of A. S. 11th July, 1828, by which a special exemption is made in regard to processes of multiplepinding, and certain others, as to which it is declared that the note may be received though no copy of the summons is appended to it.

THE COURT found the note competent; and, on the merits, made a remit of the cause to the Lord Ordinary, with power to recall the interlocutor complained of.

Lien—Delivery.—Certain goods having been shipped in a carrying vessel, and deposited, on their arrival at the port of destination, in the warehouse of the shipowners' agent—Circumstances in which held, in a question with the shippers, that the agent had no right of lien over the goods for the general debt of a party to whom the shippers had intended to consign them, but who had become bankrupt, in consequence of which no delivery was ever required on his behalf.

PREVIOUS to the year 1835, the advocators, Ridley and Company, of Newcastle-upon-Tyne, had occasionally consigned to James Stanislaus Bell of Glasgow shipments of bottles of their manufacture, as upon sale and purchase, the respondent Sloan being the Glasgow agent for the shipowners employed by Ridley and Company. In the body of the freight-bills presented by Sloan to Bell was a standing notice to the following effect:—"All goods are subject to a lien, in favour of the shipowners generally, not only for the freight and charges thereon, but for all previously unsettled freights and charges."

By letter of 27th March, 1835, James Bell gave an order to Ridley and Company to ship for him 100 gross of wine-bottles. To this letter no answer was returned, but, on 24th April, these parties shipped 100 gross of bottles in bulk, addressed to "Mr Bell, Glasgow." No invoice or bill of lading was made out, but the following receipt was granted by the shipmaster:—

"Newcastle-upon-Tyne, April 24, 1835.—Received of Thomas Ridley and Company, on board the Ann, whereof I am master, the under-mentioned goods, in good condition—which, on my arrival at Glasgow, I promise to deliver and forward to the under-mentioned person, on being paid the customary freight for the same—the danger of the sea only excepted—as witness my hand,

"JOHN CRAWFORD.

"Mr Bell, Glasgow, 1200 dozen wine-bottles in bulk."

The vessel arrived in Glasgow on the 9th of May. Previous to its arrival James Bell had become bankrupt, and intimation had been made to Sloan by James Bell's brother, Frederick Augustus Bell, a mercantile agent in Glasgow, that the bottles were to be delivered to him (Frederick A. Bell). They were landed and warehoused by Sloan. No demand for their delivery was made by James Bell or on his behalf, and no bill of lading or mandate authorizing delivery to James Bell was produced to Sloan. By letter of 13th May, Ridley and Company authorized Frederick A. Bell to take delivery of the bottles for their behoof, and at the Nr 126. same time transmitted a formal order or mandate for delivery thereof, to be presented to Sloan, to whom it was accordingly communicated. Frederick Bell having thereafter offered payment of the freight, and demanded delivery in terms of this authority, it was refused by Sloan, who alleged a right to retain the bottles in security, and for payment of a general balance due to him by James Bell on account of unpaid charges for freight.

Feb. 4, 1837.
Sloan v.
Sloan

In these circumstances, Ridley and Company, and Frederick Bell, presented a petition to the sheriff of Lanarkshire against Sloan, praying to have him ordained forthwith to deliver up the bottles to Frederick Bell on payment of the freight thereof. The petition stated, and this statement was repeated in the replies, and not expressly departed from in the condescendence which followed, that the bottles were originally shipped to the care of Frederick Bell, he being alleged to be the "Mr Bell" referred to in the shipmaster's receipt.

It was pleaded in answer by Sloan, that he was not bound to deliver the goods upon any order except from James Bell, to whom they were de facto consigned and sent, and that, looking to the contract arising out of the terms of the freight-notes above-mentioned, he was entitled to exercise a lien over the goods until his claim against James Bell should be settled.

A proof was allowed, on advising which the sheriff-substitute decided in favour of the petitioners. This judgment having been altered by the sheriff, Ridley and Company and Frederick Bell brought an advocacy, in which, changing their ground as to Frederick Bell having been the party for whom the shipment was originally meant, they pleaded, on the footing of the bottles having been intended to be sent to James Bell,—

1. Ridley and Company having retained in their own hands the receipt or bill of lading which was granted by the shipmaster for the bottles in question, and having never transmitted the same, nor any invoice or other notice of the shipment to James Bell, they were entitled to authorize any person they pleased to take delivery of these bottles from the shipmaster, and were under no obligation whatever to deliver the same, or allow the same to be delivered, to James Bell.

2. In the circumstances of this case, there was no consignment to James Bell, and no question as to stoppage in transitu can be raised; there having been no delivery to him, either real or constructive, Ridley and Company are not bound, as the condition of demanding delivery of the goods from Sloan, to pay more than the freight chargeable on the goods, and are not liable for any general balance or other sum alleged to be due by James Bell to Sloan.

It was pleaded in answer—

1. In their proceedings before the sheriff, the advocates set out with the statement, that the goods in question were sent originally to Frederick Bell, as their consignee, and on that they perilled their case they now maintain their argument on the footing that the goods were shipped to James Bell; but a party cannot be allowed thus to change his ground and plead fact alternatively, and is not entitled, after this irregular pleading, to the benefit of a judgment in law on the facts as proved.

No. 1
Feb. 2, 1881
Ridley v.
Sloan.

2. Assuming the competency of this pleading, and supposing the goods to have been intended and actually shipped for James Bell—it is admitted that Ridley and Company had not written either to Sloan or to Frederick Bell, at the date of the goods being deposited in Sloan's warehouse; but if there was no timeous intimation, Ridley and Company had no right, after the goods had reached their destination, with the consent of all parties, and without any disclaimer from James Bell, to stop in transitu, and change the party who was to receive delivery. Sloan therefore received the bottles as the goods of James Bell, and has a lien over them, in terms of the freight-notes, for freight previously due on account of his other shipments.

The Lord Ordinary advocated the cause, and pronounced the following interlocutor, adding the subjoined note: *—“ Finds it proved and * “ Though this advocacy relates to a small matter, the Lord Ordinary is of opinion that it involves a very important question of mercantile law; and, though he certainly entertains the greatest respect for the judgment of the learned sheriff, he cannot but think that it is seriously erroneous. The defender is simply in the condition of the shipowners: he cannot make himself better; and the question is, Whether, under the circumstances, he has any right of lien over these goods shipped in the vessel as a carrying vessel, against the shippers, for the general debt of a party to whom they may have intended to consign them, but who never held any right to require delivery of them, and who never did require delivery of them?

“ The Lord Ordinary is, in the first place, very clearly of opinion, that it is no answer to this case, that the pursuers laid it on an averment, in general terms, that the goods were consigned to the order of Mr Frederick A. Bell. The facts are in the condescendence and answers, and the proof; and it is apparent, that the goods were not, in any proper sense, consigned to any one, until Mr F. Bell received the warrant to demand delivery. But, in the second place, the real merits of the case lie in two very different points of law, both of which are clearly raised by the facts in the record.

“ One is, that, in the case of a common carrier, or a carrying ship, which is in pari causa, it is with extreme difficulty that any lien can be established in the carrier or shipowner against the owner of the goods transmitting them by such a conveyance, beyond the freight and charges of the goods themselves; and no case, the Lord Ordinary is inclined to think, can be shown, where such a lien has been sustained as in the shipowners against the shippers for the previous unconnected debts of the consignee.—See Bell's Commentaries, 2, p. 110, 3d Edition—and the case of Ruthworth v. Hadfield, there quoted.

“ But there is another point which appears to the Lord Ordinary to be still more conclusive. It is not strictly on the doctrine of stoppage in transitu, though it has some affinity to it. It has been a question much agitated, whether bankruptcy, ~~in fact~~, operates a stoppage in transitu. The leaning of the law of Scotland has been affirmative, contrary to the rule very reluctantly adopted by the Judges in England. But, laying this controverted point aside, on which Mr Bell expresses his opinion, it never was a matter of doubt, that a man who finds himself in a admitted, that the pursuers, Ridley and Company, shipped 400 gross of wine bottles in bulk, addressed to Mr Bell, Glasgow: Finds that there was no regular bill of lading granted, but that the receipt given by the shipmaster, dated 24th April, 1833, bore, that the goods were received, 'which, on my arrival at Glasgow, I promise to deliver and forward to the under-mentioned person, on being paid the customary freight for the same—the danger of the sea only excepted—as witness my hand.—Mr Bell, Glasgow, 1200 dozen wine bottles in bulk.—JOHN CHAWFORD: Finds it proved that no invoice or bill of lading was, in the first instance, transmitted to any one: Finds it proved that, previous to the date of the said consignment, the pursuers had been in the practice of consigning to Mr James Stanislaus Bell, of Glasgow, goods of a similar description, as upon sale and purchase: Finds it proved that, after some correspondence, Mr James S. Bell had, by letter of the 27th March, 1833, given an order or permission to ship for him 100 gross of bottles: Finds that no answer was made to that letter, but that the shipment above-mentioned was made on the 24th of April thereafter, in the terms expressed in the receipt: Finds that it is sworn by the shipmaster, that the wherry-men who brought the goods to the ship said, that they were for Mr James Bell of Glasgow—but that this is not good evidence of the fact that the consignment was made to him: Finds, however, upon the whole facts, that it may be inferred that, in original intention, these goods were meant to be addressed to the said James S. Bell: Finds it clearly proved, that, before the vessel arrived at Glasgow, it had been

state of bankruptcy, may, and ought to refuse to take delivery of goods, for which he knows he cannot pay; Bell, L. 227-8-9, and the cases there quoted. Now, assuming the defender's best state of the case here, it is very clear that Mr James S. Bell, finding himself bankrupt, did plainly reject delivery of the goods, so far as he had any title on which to demand it, and his creditors were too sensible of the entire want of title ever to attempt to ask it. This, then, being the state of the case, beyond all doubt the defender, as agent of the shipowners, held the goods for the shippers simply, no delivery being competent except on their order. They granted authority to take delivery to Mr Frederick Bell; that authority was duly intimated, with an express tender of the freight and charges. The practice under the previous freight bills, between the defender and Mr James Bell, could be of no effect against them, there being no debt due by them to the defender, and their obligation to the shipowners being expressly for freight and charges only. In short, the defender seems to have taken up some notion that he could separate himself from the shipowners, and that by warehousing the goods, without any bills of lading, any order of delivery, or any demand of delivery, for James Bell, and in the face of the notice that the delivery was to be made to Mr Frederick Bell, as agent of the shippers, and the express demand on written authority exhibited to him, he could make out a lien against them for the general balance due by James Bell. This view of the matter appears to the Lord Ordinary to be very important in point of principle. It is always to be kept in remembrance, that Mr James Bell's dealings with the pursuers were entirely as a purchaser, and never, as an agent. There is no attempt to prove that he ever acted as an agent for them: any lien against him, therefore, on previous dealings, could never create a lien against them for his debts."

intimated to Andrew Davidson, clerk of the defender, that the bottles were to be delivered to Mr Frederick A. Bell, then carrying on business as a mercantile agent in Glasgow: Finds that the vessel arrived at Glasgow on or about the 9th of May, 1835, and that the bottles were landed and warehoused by the defender and respondent, as agent of the shipowner: Finds it proved that, before that date, Mr James S. Bell had fallen into a state of bankruptcy: Finds that no demand for delivery of the said bottles was ever made by the said James S. Bell, or on his behalf; and that no invoice, bill of lading, receipt, or other order or mandate, authorizing delivery to the said James S. Bell, was ever produced to the defender and respondent: Finds that, by letter of the 13th May, 1835, the pursuers expressly authorized Mr Frederick A. Bell to demand and receive delivery of the said goods for their behoof, and transmitted, annexed to the said letter, a formal order or mandate for the delivery thereof, to be presented to the defender—which order or mandate Mr Bell has sworn that he transmitted by his clerk to the defender, but which has not been produced: Finds it clearly proved, that, after receiving such authority, Mr F. A. Bell did expressly demand delivery of the goods, tendering payment of the freight and all charges connected with that consignment: Finds, that, according to the freight bills previously used between the defender and Mr James S. Bell previous to the consignment in question, it was matter of contract, or usage in the trade, that each parcel of goods consigned should be liable to a lien or retention, not only for the freight and charges on that consignment itself, but for all previous unsettled freights and charges between the same parties: But finds, that any such contract or understanding could be of no effect against the pursuers in respect of the goods in question, except in so far as it should appear that they were so consigned as to entitle and bind the defender to deliver them to Mr James S. Bell, or to the trustee for his creditors: Finds that, on the facts thus ascertained, there never was any right vested in the said James S. Bell, in virtue of which he could have required or compelled delivery of the said bottles to him; and that it was perfectly competent to, and in the power of the pursuers, whatever was the original intention in the consignment, to authorize and instruct Mr Frederick A. Bell to take delivery of them as their agent: Finds that, supposing the consignment to have been made in the expectation of Mr James S. Bell receiving the goods, it was not only perfectly competent for him, but clearly his duty, to refuse to receive them when he found himself to be in a state of bankruptcy, and that, as no bill of lading, or other mandate for delivery to him, had ever been presented to the defender, he could acquire no right of lien for the separate debt of Mr James Bell, by the act of warehousing the goods as agent of the shipowner: Finds that there is no incompetency in this shape of the pursuers' plea, under the form of the original petition: Therefore, on the whole, recalls the interlocutor of the sheriff, and decerns in terms of Sloan reclaimed.

LORD MEADOWBANK.—I have no doubts as to the propriety of adhering to the interlocutor. The first consignment of the goods was the letter of 13th May, containing the order for delivery to Frederick Bell.

LORD MEDWYN.—I agree with the Lord Ordinary on the merits, but I differ from him as to the question of expenses. The goods were unquestionably ordered and manufactured for James Bell, and Sloan understood them to be sent for him. It was natural, in the circumstances, for Sloan to suppose that this was a mere attempt to defeat his lien. Though I cannot support his view therefore, yet looking to the manner in which the advocates originally came into Court, making a false statement as to the goods being shipped for Frederick Bell, and Sloan being satisfied that this statement was incorrect, I think it hard that he should be saddled with the whole expenses.

LORD GLENLEE.—I am for adhering to the interlocutor. I am not so impressed with the impropriety of the conduct of Ridley and Company, as to propose to deprive them of their claim for expenses in a case where the opposite party have been maintaining a plea contrary to the interests of commerce and to views of common sense. It is plain the goods were not intended to be sent to James Bell, otherwise than on sale. The state of the fact came out in the course of the proceedings. This was a special contract. The parties had nothing to do but with this contract; and it is not said that there was any regular freight-note, bearing that, in the event of a claim arising for the freight of these goods, it should extend to the freight of all other goods freighted for James Bell. The shipowners and their agent, Sloan, must obey the order for delivery to Frederick Bell. In consequence of what occurred, the goods devolved on the original owners. I therefore think the interlocutor right; and, though very ready to be influenced by the views of Lord Medwyn, I cannot see any such impropriety in the conduct of the advocates as to prevent them obtaining their expenses.

LORD MEADOWBANK.—There being no bill of lading, my impression was that the shippers wished to keep the goods in their own hands. The goods were in such a situation that the shipmaster, without farther notice, was not in right to have delivered them to any body.

LORD JUSTICE CLERK was absent.

THE COURT accordingly adhered, finding additional expenses.

Obligation.—Road Trustees.—Certain proprietors having undertaken the formation of a turnpike-road through a district in which their lands lay, and having communicated the scheme to a non-resident proprietor of an entailed estate, who intimated a general approval, and signed the first of a series of bonds granted for money borrowed to complete the undertaking, but died before the date of the second—Circumstances which, in a question with the other proprietors, held not to establish against him an obligation for the whole undertaking, so as to bind his representatives beyond the extent of his share of the bond which he had subscribed.

In the year 1825, the pursuers, the Earl of Traquair and six others, proprietors in the lower district of Peebles-shire, resolved on the formation of a road from the confines of Selkirkshire, by Leithen Water, through the district of the county of Peebles in which their properties lay, to the borders of Mid-Lothian, for which powers had been obtained in an act of Parliament passed some time before. For this purpose they caused a general meeting of road trustees of the county of Peebles to be called to take the matter into consideration, and at that meeting, held on the 20th October, 1825, it was “resolved unanimously that the meeting shall authorize the heritors of the parishes of Traquair and Innerleithen, immediately on the works contemplated being in such condition that toll-duties may be legally exigible, to erect such number of toll-bars as may be sanctioned by law on the road proposed to be amended, altered, and formed from the point called the Piper’s Grave, to the boundary of the the county of Selkirk; and that the meeting resolve that an assignation be granted to the said heritors, or a committee to be named by them, of the proceeds of the said toll-bars to be erected for the indemnification of those who may advance money for amending, altering, and forming the said road, building the bridge proposed, and for every other purpose connected with the said road, under such reservation as is required by the statute 1818 to be made in granting such assignment.”

Among the properties likely to be benefited on the proposed new road was that of Cardrona, which was held under terms of a strict entail by the late Dr Williamson, who had succeeded to it in the previous year, but was permanently domiciled in England, and never was in Scotland after his succession. On the 5th December, 1825, Mr Allan of Glen, one of the pursuers, wrote to Charles Balfour Scott, W.S., as the agent of Dr Williamson, the following letter:—“My dear Sir,—I expect to see the long-talked-of road up Leithen Water begun next spring, as the under-noted proprietors in the county of Peebles have got liberty to ~~make the~~ road, and put the legal number of tolls on it, for security of ~~the~~ expended on the said road and bridge over Tweed at Traquair

This letter was communicated to Dr Williamson by Mr Scott, accompanied by one from himself in these terms:—"7th December, 1825.—The road proposed is a road from Innerleithen towards Edinburgh, and it certainly would be a great advantage to that part of the country. At the same time, situated as you are, and not having it in your power to take any share in the management, you may perhaps not feel disposed to give your name to the bond. I merely mention this for your consideration; and in case you feel disposed to countenance the undertaking, you might perhaps prefer doing it by a subscription, either for the road or bridge."

In answer Dr Williamson wrote to Mr Scott:—"10th December, 1825.—I am very glad to hear of the projected road up Leithen Water, and the bridge over the Tweed, which I really think will be a great improvement, and I consent with pleasure to your adding my name to the respectable list."

Mr Scott, on the 22d December, wrote Dr Williamson that he "would in due time communicate to Mr Allan your intentions as to Leithen Water road and bridge over the Tweed." There was no evidence, however, that Mr Scott had shown Dr Williamson's letter to Mr Allan or any of the pursuers, but it was admitted that he had intimated to Mr Allan that Dr Williamson was favourable to the scheme.

On the 24th of March, 1826, a meeting of the proprietors interested in the proposed road was held, in the sederunt of which Mr Allan was inserted as appearing for himself and for Dr Williamson, but there was no evidence that Mr Allan was authorized to appear or act for that gentleman. At this meeting, it was stated that a plan and survey of the proposed road had been prepared, and that the estimated expenses was about £6000, and the minute further bore as follows:—"The gentlemen present, taking into consideration the great benefit which the formation of this road will afford to the country,—Resolve unanimously, that the same shall be made at the joint expense of the parties hereto, and for whom at the meeting appearance is made (it being understood always that Mr Suttie and his father, Sir James, are not to be accounted as two obligants, but that Mr Suttie binds Sir James); and as money must be borrowed for the works, they agree that the parties and their constituents shall raise the money by loan; therefore the parties hereto agree, and bind and oblige themselves to the effect following: That is to say, that a sum not exceeding six thousand pounds sterling shall be borrowed on the joint security of Lord Linton, Mr Campbell, Sir James Suttie, Mr Steuart, Mr Allan, Dr Williamson, and Mr Horsburgh, in one sum, or in such separate sums as the committee herein after named, or quorum thereof, shall direct; and the parties bind and oblige themselves, and their constituents (Mr Suttie as aforesaid only binding Sir James), to execute the bond or bonds that may be necessary; and if any one shall be absent when the bonds come to be signed, the parties agree for themselves, and their constituents as aforesaid, that the said bonds may be executed by the other parties, or any two of them, and that the party or parties not executing the same on being required, give their or his obligations, or obligation, to free and relieve the parties who may have signed the bonds of the proportion thereof, which, under the agreement hereby made, behoved to be borne by the party who may not have signed the same."

This minute was signed by the gentlemen present, and afterwards by Sir James Suttie, as approving of the obligation come under for him by his son, and by another gentleman (Mr Ballantyne) who was absent, and these parties to this minute, seven in number, form the pursuers in the present action. No copy of the minute was communicated by direction of the meeting to Dr Williamson or Mr Scott; but the latter, as agent and one of the curators, alongst with Mr Allan and Dr Williamson, of a minor nephew of the latter—having agreed to lend a sum of £1025, belonging to the minor, to the gentlemen engaged in this undertaking, a copy of the above minute was sent to Mr Scott in the month of June, as the authority for borrowing the money. For this sum a bond was granted by the pursuers and Dr Williamson, setting forth as follows: "Considering that we have formed the resolution of making a road down Leithen water, and of erecting bridges on the said line of road, and across the Tweed, and of borrowing money for the accomplishment thereof, grant us instantly to have borrowed and received the sum of £1025," &c. This bond was transmitted to Dr Williamson, and was executed by him in the month of September, 1826. The road was commenced, but in the month of January, 1827, and before any further money was borrowed, Dr Williamson died, being succeeded in the lands of Cardrona by the Earl of Traquair, who did not otherwise represent him, and leaving a will by which he appointed Mr Scott and Mrs Abigail Conyers or Williamson his executors.

amounting in all to £6025, were borrowed by the pursuers, from time to time, till the end of the year 1829, when the road was completed. During all this period, and down to 1832, no intimation was made to Dr Williamson's executors that they were considered to be liable for any share of the expense of the road, but subsequently a demand was made on them for an eighth share, on the ground that Dr Williamson had personally bound himself to the full extent of the undertaking. This demand being resisted, except in regard to a share of the bond subscribed by Dr Williamson, the pursuers raised this action against the executors, concluding for payment.

The defence was, that Dr Williamson (whose only interest was as proprietor of an entailed estate) had done nothing to bind himself and representatives beyond the amount of the bond he had actually subscribed.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor, adding the subjoined note : *—" Finds that the late Charles Williamson, Esq. was

* " This case is certainly doubtful. The first impression is perhaps against the defenders. But, on full consideration, the Lord Ordinary has come to the conviction that the law and justice of the case require a judgment in their favour.

" This is an attempt to subject the personal representatives of an heir of entail deceased, who have no connexion with the entailed estate, in a full share of the expense of making a road for the benefit of the landed interest in the district, all of which was incurred and laid out after his death. For what was incurred in his lifetime by the only bond which he signed, the liability is admitted. He may have so bound himself as to make his personal estate liable for the whole. But, in the question, whether he has done so or not, to the effect of relieving the other proprietors, a clear case ought to be made out. There is no question with creditors.

" No written obligation to that effect by the deceased was ever delivered to the pursuers, or could be produced by them. His letter to his own agent, whether it was shown to Mr Allan or not (and of that disputed fact no evidence has been offered), and whatever may be its legal import, certainly was not delivered to the pursuers or to Mr Allan. And the bond founded on, whatever may be its effect otherwise, does not either express or imply an obligation to the pursuers, to be equally answerable with them for whatever other debts might be contracted in making the road.

" As Dr Williamson did not deliver to the pursuers any such written obligation, neither did he, or any agent whom he authorized, attend any meeting at which such an obligation could be contracted. Whatever may have been the impression under which Mr Allan assumed authority to state himself as appearing for Dr Williamson, he certainly held no mandate from him, nor is it said that he had such a mandate even from Mr Scott, supposing that to have been competent.

" The liability must, therefore, be made out by facts and circumstances, that is, by inference from circumstances in the conduct, partly of Dr Williamson, and partly of Mr Scott his agent. This might be done ; but it is not easy, especially where there is no question with creditors ; and the conduct of the other parties must also be taken into view. The case of the pursuers seems to stand thus : Mr Allan's letter to Mr Scott of the 5th December, 1825, intimated to him the general design of the other gentlemen, mentioning that they intended to grant a joint and several bond for the money required, and expressed a wish that Dr Williamson would allow Mr Scott to add his name to the list subjoined. Mr Scott communicated this to Dr Williamson, but suggested a doubt whether he would think it expedient to join in the proposed bond. Dr Williamson answered to his own agent in general terms, consenting to Mr Scott adding his name to the list. It is a matter in dispute, whether this letter was communicated to Mr Allan or not; and in the state of the cause it cannot be assumed. But it is admitted, that Mr Scott, told Mr Allan generally, that Dr Williamson was favourable to the scheme; and it might be implied that he did not refuse to assist in it. Then the meeting of the 24th March, 1826, took place, at which Mr Allan, no doubt imagining that he had authority, put his name in the sederunt for Dr Williamson as well as for himself. The resolutions of that meeting constitute the undertaking of the parties. The minute never was communicated to Dr Williamson, nor was it communicated to Mr Scott by the pursuers or by their order, though in the case of Sir James Suttie, for whom appearance was made by another, this was expressly done, and the act was confirmed by him in the minutes. But, in consequence of Mr Scott having offered to negotiate a loan of part of the money, a copy of the minute came accidentally into his hands, and after seeing it, without making any objection, he prepared the bond for £1025, inserting Dr Williamson's name as a party obligant, and bearing that the subscribers, 'considering that we have formed the resolution of making a road,' &c. and 'of borrowing money for the accomplishment thereof,' have accordingly borrowed the sum of £1025. The bond in these terms was sent to Dr Williamson for signature, and was returned duly subscribed by him, and held by Mr Scott thereafter as agent of the lender. Soon after this Dr Williamson died. This seems to be the substance of the case against the defenders; but, though it leaves an impression at first as if Dr Williamson had fully committed himself to the undertaking, it seems to the Lord Ordinary that there are serious defects in it for making out the liability maintained against him. When the proposal was first communicated to Dr Williamson, it was of a very general nature, no meeting having been yet held, no plan fixed upon, and no sum mentioned; and though Mr Allan had said that the gentlemen proposed to grant a joint and several bond, that is not what was done; nor was any bond for the whole money ever laid before Dr Williamson. It does not appear that any further communication was made to him, except Mr Scott's letter acknowledging the receipt of Dr Williamson's, and saying that he should communicate his intention to Mr Allan; till the bond for £1025 was sent for signature. The narrative of that bond imports no more than that in general the parties had agreed to make the road, and to borrow money for the purpose. But neither in that bond, nor in Mr Scott's letter accompanying it, is there any thing to inform Dr Williamson that he was supposed to have agreed to join in as many bonds as the other parties might propose, or that, whether he chose to join in them or not, and whether he lived or died, he was to be answerable for an expense exceeding £6000. When he signed that particular bond, therefore, there was no ground to suppose that individually he meant to undertake the extensive liability now maintained against his representatives. The terms of his original letter would not warrant this. Indeed the Lord Ordinary doubts whether his real meaning was not somewhat in conformity with his agent's recommendation, believing that he reserved entirely for his own consideration what bond or bonds he might think fit to subscribe; and the terms of the bond which he did subscribe, can only be construed with reference to the obligation which he thereby contracted, it being merely an engagement to a third party.

The plea of the pursuers, therefore, seems to be reduced to this,—that Mr Scott, the agent, having seen the minute of the meeting, though not directly communicated to him, and though no confirmation was asked of him, must be held to have recognised all that was done as really in Dr Williamson's name and by

127. bond libelled on, with all interest falling due thereon; and that the defender Mrs Williamson, as representing him, and the defender Scott, as his executor, are liable in a question with the pursuers for a share or proportion of the said sum, and the interest thereon; and decerns in terms of the conclusion of the libel to that effect; but sustains the defences against the other conclusions of the libel, assolizies the defenders, and decerns: Finds expenses due to the defenders, and renders the account, when lodged, to the auditor to be taxed."

The pursuers reclaimed.

LORD MEADOWS BANK considered, that, under all the circumstances, Dr Williamson had become a party to the undertaking, which was carried into execution on the faith of all who concurred being responsible for a share of the expenses so that he could not have stopped it by drawing back if he had been alive, and that his death could not alter the nature of the engagement.

LORD MADWYN concurred with the Lord Ordinary.

his authority; and that, through him, without any other act, Dr Williamson and his representatives thus, by silence, became answerable in every event in the most extent of debt which might be contracted. The Lord Ordinary would have the greatest hesitation in acceding to this, even though nothing more had passed. It is inferring an extent of undertaking which was never put before Dr Williamson at all, from the mere acts of the pursuers themselves, and at the most the repugnance of an agent. But there is more in the case. For it does appear to the Lord Ordinary that there is real evidence that neither the pursuers nor Dr Scott supposed that any such unlimited or continuous liability had been undertaken. After Dr Williamson's death, the various additional loans were negotiated but, though Mr Scott was the executor of Dr Williamson, and some of the loans went through his hands, the idea was never suggested that he, or the representatives of Dr Williamson, must join in the bonds. The bonds were made exclusively by the other parties; and it was not till a long time after, when the adventure was found unproductive, that the idea was taken up of making the representatives liable for a share of the loans, in which they had not been asked to concur. And, even after the notion was adopted, and after the pursuers had had the advice of counsel, Mr Allan, by his letter of 31st May, 1832, distinctly intimated that they did not mean to claim more than Dr Williamson's share of the bond for £1025.

"Now, although the Lord Ordinary would hesitate to find upon that letter that there was a complete release from the claim, if otherwise well-founded except as it might fully warrant Mr Scott to distribute the executry estate, thinks that, combined with the previous conduct of the pursuers, it is very material, as showing that the pursuers themselves had not supposed at that time that Dr Williamson had undertaken any general liability for the debt. They say that they did not then know that Mr Scott had received any copy of the minute; but this is the very circumstance which is most against them. They had never furnished the minute to Mr Scott; and, judging of the case on that state of the facts they had made no claim on the executor at first, and gave it up after they had advanced it; and thus the claim comes to be rested on a circumstance quite adventitious, on which the pursuers could have no right to infer that such a responsibility had been created.

"Though the case is doubtful, the Lord Ordinary thinks that expenses are due, both on account of the situation of the executors, and the departure of the pursuers from the resolution which they themselves had intimated."

Public Officer—Reparation—Process—Jury Trial.—1. A summons of damages was raised against magistrates of a burgh and others on account of alleged misconduct in regard to legal procedure of a criminal nature; the summons did not contain the words "maliciously and without probable cause," and the magistrates claimed the protection of the statutes (43 Geo. III. c. 141: 9 Geo. IV. c. 29: and 11 Geo. IV. and 1 Will. IV. c. 37) limiting their liability to twopence of damages:—Held that the pursuer was not entitled under such a summons to take an issue containing the words "maliciously and without probable cause." 2. Terms of a summons to which this rule was applied. 3. Question, whether, if a summons contains an allegation of such facts as cannot be true without the existence of malice and the want of probable cause, but does not contain these precise words themselves, an issue would be objectionable as disconform to the summons, if such issue contained these words.

GRACE HAY OF ANDERSON, wife of David Anderson, residing at Feb. 3, 1834: Airdrie, raised an action concluding for damages to the amount of £5000, against James Hill and others, magistrates and procurator-fiscal respectively of the burgh of Airdrie, and Thomas Main, blacksmith there. After defences were lodged, and a record made up, the Lord Ordinary, in advising with the Court, "opened the record, and found that the summons must be held to be laid on charges, against the defenders, of misconduct in regard to procedure of a criminal nature; and found that the summons, so construed, is defective in precision; and therefore appointed the pursuers to amend the same."<sup>1</sup> An amended summons was then framed, which libelled that Hugh M'Culloch, the procurator-fiscal of the burgh, without having preferred any complaint, or obtained any warrant, caused Grace Hay, the pursuer, to be cited on Sunday 27th April, 1834, to appear next day before James Hill and others, the magistrates, to answer to an accusation of having used a pump-well, contrary to the wishes of the said magistrates and Thomas Main; that she appeared, being ignorant that there was no warrant to cite her; that M'Culloch and Main both appeared as prosecutors; that M'Culloch produced a complaint which had been only prepared on Monday, and contained no warrant of citation, and had no list of witnesses appended; that she denied the allegations in it, but the defenders, "being determined most wrongfully, illegally, causelessly, and oppressively to crush and punish her, under pretext of the said complaint, which they were conscious was totally unfounded, took no notice of her denial, but, contrary to all truth and justice, pretended to hold that she had admitted some part of the complaint;" that she offered to prove she had only acted according to her just rights; that "the defenders being resolved to carry their said illegal, wrongful, and oppressive purposes into effect, would not allow her to prove any thing, and threatened to commit her witnesses to prison, if they did not instantly leave the court:" that her witnesses were actually driven from the court; that the subject of dispute was a civil right, and the procurator-fiscal and magistrates had no jurisdiction; that M'Culloch and Main led no proof excepting what related to a different matter from the complaint, being some alleged abusive words used by the pursuer to Main, and the magistrates refused to hear her counter evidence, and "wrongfully, illegally, and oppressively ordered her witnesses out of court, and threatened to lock up or confine them, and one of the witnesses was laid hold of by the officer for imprisonment, under the direction of the said magistrates, and they thereafter wrongfully, illegally, and unwarrantably pronounced sentence against her for the sum of 2s. 6d, with 2s. of expenses, and unjustly, illegally, and incompetently and oppressively granted warrant for imprisoning her till she should make payment of the sums decerned for:" that, on the day following, she was imprisoned, and detained in prison, where she was cruelly treated as a most abandoned criminal, till the following Saturday, when she was set free; that the complaint against her was loose, inaccurate, and incompetent; that the whole proceedings were illegal, and, in particular, the sentence "was wrongful, illegal, and oppressive, and altogether beyond the powers of the defenders;" that her place of imprisonment was not a legal jail for debtors or criminals; that, after her liberation, the town-clerk of Airdrie, and the procurator-fiscal, refused to allow her an inspection of the complaint or warrant against her; that although she had demanded reparation for the injury occasioned "in the illegal, incompetent, unjustifiable, and oppressive manner particularly before detailed," yet this was refused; "that the whole of the proceedings on the part of the defenders were grossly illegal, incompetent, wrongful, oppressive, and not within any privilege on the part of the said defenders:" and therefore the five defenders should be found liable, jointly and severally, in £5000, or each in £1000, in name of damages.

Defences were lodged, and a record was made up, after which the following issue was prepared and was approved by the Lord Ordinary, for trying the cause.

"Whether, on or about the 28th of April, 1834, the defenders, or any of them, maliciously, and without probable cause, wrongfully apprehended and imprisoned in the jail of Airdrie, or wrongfully caused to be apprehended and imprisoned as aforesaid, the pursuer, Grace Hay or Anderson, or maliciously and without probable cause detained, or caused to be detained, the said pursuer from or about the said 28th day of April till on or about the 3d day of May, 1834, or during any part of the said period, to the loss, injury, and damage of the said pursuer?"

Hay v. Hill.

Two of the magistrates and the procurator-fiscal thereon enrolled the cause before the Inner-House, "to object to the issue settled by Lord Fullerton, Ordinary, for the trial of the cause, in respect that the said issue is disconform to the summons, and relative record, in so far as it is not averred in the summons in said action, that the acts complained of were done by the defenders, maliciously and without probable cause, while the issue is approved of, on the assumption that malice and want of probable cause had been so averred."

The pursuer took an objection that it was incompetent to enter on the discussion of this motion, as the record had not been printed and boxed to the Court, but merely the summons. The defenders answered, that as the objection rested on disconformity between the summons and the issue, it was not necessary to box the record for the information of the Court; and there was no necessity in point of form, for boxing the record.

The Court repelled the objection; and the defenders (magistrates) then pleaded that it was enacted by 43 Geo. III. c. 141, § 1, in regard to actions of damages against justices of the peace, on account of convictions, &c. made by them, that the pursuer "shall not be entitled to recover any more or greater damages than the sum of twopence, nor any costs of suit whatsoever, unless it shall be expressly alleged in the declaration in the action wherein the recovery shall be had, and which shall be in an action upon the case only, that such acts were done maliciously, and without any reasonable and probable cause." That it was enacted by 9 Geo. IV. c. 29, § 26, that the provisions of 43 Geo. III. c. 141, "shall extend to all inferior judges and magistrates in Scotland, in regard to any sentence pronounced, or proceeding had, in any criminal trial." And that it was enacted by 11 Geo. IV. and 1 Will. IV. c. 37, § 13, that the statute 9 Geo. IV. c. 29, "in so far as it provides for rendering all inferior judges and magistrates more safe in the execution of their duty, shall extend to all acts done by any such judge or magistrate in apprehending any party, or in regard to any criminal cause or proceeding, or to any prosecution for a pecuniary penalty." In this case it had been fixed by a final interlocutor that the summons was laid on charges of misconduct "in regard to procedure of a criminal nature," and therefore the defenders were fully within the protection of these statutes. If the pursuer meant either to claim higher damages than twopence, or to claim costs of suit, she was therefore bound to have "expressly alleged" in the summons that the acts complained of "were done maliciously and without any reasonable and probable cause." But as the summons was not so framed the issue must correspond with it, and these words "maliciously and without probable cause" must be struck out of the issue.

The pursuer answered, that if the summons contained a charge of such proceedings as could not be true unless they were done maliciously and without probable cause, there was no incongruity between such a summons and the existing issue, although the mere words "maliciously and without probable cause" did not occur in the summons. These words were but descriptive of what was essential; and if the substance of what was essential, was embodied in the summons, that was enough, though none of these descriptive words were added. This principle was applied in the case of Kelly.<sup>1</sup> But the summons did contain such a charge, as it averred that the pursuer was cited on a Sunday, and without a warrant; that though she denied the charge against her, and the defenders were conscious it was unfounded, yet they, for the purpose of oppressively crushing her, pretended to hold that she had in part admitted it; that they refused to allow her to prove her case, and drove her witnesses out of court; and in the end fined her, and cruelly imprisoned her in a place which was no legal jail; and that the whole of these proceedings were "grossly illegal, incompetent, wrongful, oppressive, and not within any privilege on the part of the defenders." These allegations in substance amounted to a charge of acting maliciously and without probable cause, and that was enough to sustain the existing issue as conform to the summons.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The magistrates who are defenders here are entitled to the benefit of the statutes quoted by them, and it is, for their protection, enacted by these statutes, that any summons like this, shall "expressly allege" that the acts complained of were done "maliciously and without probable cause;" otherwise no conclusion for more than twopence of damages, and no conclusion for expenses, can be maintained against them. The action, without that express allegation, may be good for twopence of damages, but for nothing else. On looking at the terms of the statute, I think it provides that malice shall be expressly charged, and that there is no equivalent which can supply the place of that essential word, or of the words "want of probable cause." Indeed, if I were asked what is the true equivalent of the "want of probable cause," I am afraid I know but one answer to it: it is, "the want of probable cause." Now as the technical words required by the statute are omitted, we can neither supply them, nor substitute any thing else for them. There are plenty of strong words in the summons, but the essential words are wanting: And, as the summons now stands, the existing issue will not come under it. I think it must be amended, by striking out of it the words "malicious-ly and without probable cause,' which amendment will render it consistent with the summons. In regard to the case of Kelly, arising under one of the Edinburgh Police Acts, it affords no precedent to this, as it depended on the construction of the terms of that police act, just as the present case depends on the construction of the statutes founded on by the defenders. No. 128.

Hay v. Hill.

LORD GILLIES.—I am of the same opinion. In reference to the terms of the statutes founded on by the defenders, which are different from the local statute in Kelly's case, I am satisfied that malice and want of probable cause must be expressly alleged. There is no equipollent term which can be substituted for them; and even if there were such terms, I do not think they are used in this summons. As to the use of any terms from which, it is said, a charge of malice is to be inferred, I cannot hold that these will satisfy the statute: and therefore the summons in this case is just a relevant summons for two pence of damages, against these defenders, because it wants what the statutes declare to be essential to render it relevant for any other or higher conclusion. And as the issue contains the words "maliciously and without probable cause," it is at variance with the summons, which is altogether unwarrantable. It should therefore be amended by striking out these words, so as to be made to correspond with the summons.

LORD MACKENZIE.—I do not think the case of Kelly a precedent to this; but I feel this to be a very difficult question. If it were the abstract question whether an issue, containing the words "maliciously and without probable cause," was essentially disconform to a summons, which, without containing these actual terms, nevertheless contained the substance and the thing which these terms describe, viz. a charge of such proceedings as, if true, must have been malicious and without probable cause, then I should have great doubt whether such issue was at all objectionable for disconformity. Suppose, for example, that a summons which did not contain the words "malice, &c." contained a charge that a magistrate, actuated by a spirit of revenge, or having taken a bribe, wilfully found facts proved which he knew to be not proved and not true, and, in respect of these facts, imposed a fine or imprisonment, I cannot but think that under a summons of damages charging these proceedings, the pursuer would be entitled to an issue, whether such proceedings were had maliciously and without probable cause, and that he would not be barred from such an issue, by the want of these precise words in the summons. Substantially, such an issue would rather seem to be conformable to the summons; as it would be going too far to hold that no words can be allowed to get into the issue unless they have the warrant of first being used in the summons. However, I do not think that that very general point arises here. It is narrowed, first, by the special terms of the statutes referred to, which may be thought to require the very words "maliciously and without probable cause," to be engrossed in the body of the summons; and it is farther narrowed by the specialty that it is doubtful here, whether the allegations in the summons are really tantamount to a charge of malice and want of probable cause; especially the latter of these things. And, on the whole, the leaning of my opinion is to concur with your Lordship and Lord Gillies, in directing the words to be struck out of this issue; which order, at most, will go no further than a finding that the statutes require the ipsissima verba of malice and want of probable cause, to be inserted in any summons which is to be insisted in for more than two pence of damages, against any magistrate who is within the protection of the statutes.

- No. 128. THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Find that the terms of the summons do not warrant an issue of malice and want of probable cause, and in respect thereof, disallow the issue in this case, and remit to the clerk to prepare issues of new."

Railton v. Gray.

Great avizandum was made with the summons to the Court. No appearance was made for the defenders. The cause came first before the Court on 1st December, 1836, at which advising Lord Balgray observed that it was proper to have some evidence laid before the Court to prove that there was a necessity for the sale.

G. G. Bell, for Pursuers.—The principal subject is an inn, with its yard and stables. There are four pro indiviso proprietors; and it would appear that there is thus real evidence of the necessity of a sale as the subject cannot be divided.

LORD BALGRAY.—Since this is a proceeding in absence, it is peculiarly liable to challenge afterwards if any irregularity be committed, or any looseness of procedure allowed. I think we should remit to the Lord Ordinary to allow a proof as to the expediency and necessity of a sale, before we go farther.

The other Judges were of the same opinion, and the Court remitted to the Lord Ordinary, who “allowed the pursuers a proof of the necessity or propriety of the proposed sale.”

A proof was led, in which witnesses well acquainted with the property deponed “that it was impossible to divide the same into so many portions.” This proof was reported to the Court, who pronounced this interlocutor, “in respect of the foregoing report, and having advised the case, find that the subject in question cannot be divided, and must be sold for the purpose of division, and remit to the Lord Ordinary, to allow a proof of the value of the subject, and to proceed farther in authorizing a sale, as shall be just.”

 v. who soon after declared his insolvency, and called a meeting of his creditors. An offer of composition of 7s. per pound, payable at six, twelve, and
 ra. and eighteen months, was accepted by many of them, and among others by Pullman, who received three composition-bills from Jacques. Jacques fled the country, in utter insolvency, without paying any of his composition-bills to Pullman, and it did not appear that all the creditors had ever acceded to the offer of composition. Some steps, towards concerting general measures among the creditors were taken, but neither Pullman nor his mandatory Railton, were parties to these, and Railton, in the mean time, as the composition had fallen to the ground, executed a pointing of the shop goods of Jacques, for behoof of Pullman, proceeding on the bill for £102, 10s. The late Robert Muir, writer in Glasgow, acting on behalf of the creditors who wished to pursue joint measures, sent a circular to Pullman, along with the other creditors, recommending an assignation of their debts to Alexander Gray, accountant in Glasgow, for the common behoof, and Pullman granted, in favour of Gray, an assignation of his debt and the three composition-bills. Before this assignation arrived from London, Railton had carried through a sale under the pointing of the shop goods; and, as a balance of £86, 5s. still remained due under the bill for £102, 10s., he, in about a month afterwards, being in ignorance of the assignation by Pullman to Gray, executed another pointing; as for Pullman's behoof, of certain furniture belonging to Jacques, and was taking steps for selling it, when Gray obtained an interdict from the Sheriff of Lanarkshire. Railton made appearance to oppose the interdict, and, in the course of the discussion, Pullman recalled the assignation he had granted to Gray, and homologated Railton's whole proceedings. The Sheriff granted interdict against Railton's proceeding with the sale, whereupon he brought an advocacy, in which Pullman sisted himself as a party. The Lord Ordinary was of opinion, that, for a month prior to the date when the second pointing was executed, the authority of Railton to raise diligence on the bill was at an end, in consequence of Pullman's assignation of his whole debt to Gray, as acting for the general creditors; and that if Railton had no authority, as Pullman's mandatory, to execute the pointing at the date when he did so, it was invalid, and this want of authority could not be supplied by Pullman's subsequently recalling the assignation granted to Gray; his Lordship therefore repelled the reasons of advocacy, and remitted simpliciter to the Sheriff. Railton and Pullman reclaimed, and the Court considered it a case which was attended with difficulty, but, as it appeared to their Lordships, in all the circumstances, that the assignation by Pullman to Gray had been unduly impe-trated by Muir in favour of Gray, and would not have been granted if all the facts had been made known to him, as they ought to have been, they held that Gray could not found on such assignation as a bar to Railton's proceeding with his poinding. Their Lordships, therefore, altered the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, and found Railton entitled to proceed with the poinding; and found Railton and Pullman entitled to their expenses.

Process—Record.—Mutual actions of count and reckoning were raised prior to the passing of the Judicature Act, defences to which were given in, and a remit made to an accountant, who reported accordingly; after the passing of the act, various procedure took place in the Outer House, without a record being made up; a reclaiming note against certain interlocutory judgments of the Lord Ordinary praying the Court, inter alia, to ordain a record to be made up in terms of the Judicature Act and Act of Sederunt, refused; and observed, that his Lordship, if he thought it necessary, might order a record to be so made up.

THESE were conjoined actions of count and reckoning raised some years prior to the passing of the Judicature Act in 1826. Defences had been put in and a remit made to an accountant, who reported accordingly; and thereafter various procedure took place without any record being made up. In the summer and autumn sessions of 1836, a protracted discussion took place as to the sisting of a mandatary for Mr Ure. The party proposed was objected to "in respect he was not a solicitor in the Supreme Court, but merely a clerk of Mr J. J. Fraser, and not of a sufficiently high grade." The Lord Ordinary, however, "held him duly sisted;" and thereafter found Ure liable in the expenses incurred in the discussions regarding the sisting of a mandatary, and, at the same time, appointed the parties to lodge notes of their objections to the accountant's report.

Against these interlocutors Ure presented a reclaiming note, praying the Court to recal them, and, "in respect no record has been made up in the said conjoined actions, to remit to the Lord Ordinary to ordain a record to be made up accordingly, in terms of the Judicature Act and relative Acts of Sederunt; and to find the respondent liable in the expenses of the discussion relative to sisting the mandatary."

In support of the prayer of the note as to having a record made up, Ure referred to the provisions of the Judicature Act and to Grant v. Taylor, May 31, 1833.

LORD MEDWYN.—This is a case which commenced before the Judicature Act. I think the Lord Ordinary has followed the course of procedure which is adopted in such cases; and it is the best course, and the least expensive. If his Lordship think it necessary, he may order a record to be made up.

LORD MEADOWBANK concurred.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK was absent.

THE COURT accordingly refused the note, finding additional expenses.

SEQUEL of the petition noticed ante, Jan. 27, 1837, which see. In making a remit to persons of skill to value the lands and report, in terms of the statute, the Court were of opinion that the intervention of a Lord Ordinary was not necessary, and that they should remit at once to persons of skill, who should report directly to themselves. Property—Seashore—Regalia—Title to Pursue.—The proprietor of an estate on the seacoast, was infeft in the lands, “with parts, pendicles, and pertinents;” he raised a declarator of his sole and exclusive right to the whole shell-sand, wreck, or seaware on the shores of his lands, and concluded for interdict prohibiting certain parties from carrying away any part thereof; he averred that he and his predecessors had had constant, peaceable, and uninterrupted possession and use of the shell-sand, &c., past the memory of man, which was never interfered with, until lately, by the defenders; the defenders pleaded that in respect his titles did not contain an express grant of the shore, nor describe his lands as bounded by the sea, he had not condescended upon any title in virtue of which to prescribe a right by possession to the seashore, or to the shell-sand, &c. as accessories of such right: Held that the plea should be repelled, and the pursuer’s title, in reference to his allegation of possession, sustained.

ALEXANDER MACALISTER of Loup, was proprietor of the lands of Ballivean, Tangietarvie, and others, all lying along part of Macrihanish bay, on the west coast of Kintyre. The lands of Kildalloig, belonging to the trustees of the late Dugald Campbell, lie along the rest of the bay. The lands of Craigs and others, belonging to John Campbell and David Stewart Galbreath of Glensaddell, are in the vicinity of the shore of the bay, but not contiguous to it. Alexander Macalister was infeft in the lands of Ballivean "with houses, biggings, grazings, shealings, mosses, muirs, meadows, woods, fishings, parts, pendicles, and pertinents;" in the lands of Tangietarvie "with houses, biggings, yards, tofts, crofts, grazings, shealings, parts, pendicles, and universal pertinents thereof whatsoever;" and in his other lands with a clause of "parts, pendicles, and pertinents thereof whatsoever." He, (with consent of his curators, as he was a minor,) raised an action of declarator against the proprietors of the lands of Kildalloig and Craigs and others, alleging that they wrongfully carried off shell-sand, and wreck or seaware, which was valuable for kelp and manure, from the shore of his property; that no party had any right to do so except the pursuer and his superior, the Duke of Argyle, under a servitude reserved in the feu-right; and concluding for declarator that he "has the sole and exclusive right to the whole shell-sand, wreck, or seaware, growing, or that may be cast or found upon the shores of the said lands, under burden of the foresaid servitude, in favour of his superior, his Grace, George William Duke of Argyle; and that neither the said trustees of the said Dugald Campbell, nor the said John Campbell, or David Stewart Galbreath, or their said tenants, nor any other person claiming under them, have any right or title to carry away any of the said shell-sand, and wreck, or seaware, or to trespass upon the said estate, or the shores thereof, for that purpose: And the said defenders ought and should be decerned and ordained, by decree foresaid, to desist and cease from coming themselves, their tenants, or servants upon the shores of the pursuer's said lands, and from carrying off any shell-sand, seaware, or wreck, therefrom, in all time coming."

In making up a record, Macalister averred "that in virtue of his titles, he and his predecessors and authors, and their servants, tenants, and others, authorized by them, have been in the constant, peaceable, and uninterrupted possession and use of the said shell-sand and wreck, or seaware, beyond the memory of man, subject always to a right of servitude over the same, in favour of his Grace, George William Duke of Argyle, the superior of the said lands, and that they have never been interfered with in the possession and use thereof, until lately by the defenders."

The defenders, besides other defences, stated their first plea in law in these terms: "The pursuer has not produced or condescended upon any title in virtue of which he could prescribe a right by possession to the shell-sand, wreck, or seaware to which he now lays

The Lord Ordinary "appointed the parties to give in mutual cases, upon the title, and upon the nature and effect of the averments of the pursuer, as to the possession."

The defenders pleaded, 1st, That the seashore, so far as covered by the ordinary tides, was inter régala, or was juris publici; <sup>1</sup> that a subject of this description was never carried as part and pertinent of a feudal grant of lands, <sup>2</sup> at least where there was no erection of the lands into a barony; and that as the pursuer's titles merely contained a disposition to lands, with part and pertinent, without even stating that they were bounded by the sea or shore, the shore was reserved out of such a grant, and was still belonging to the crown. 2d, If the pursuer had thus no more right to the shore opposite to his lands, than any others of the lieges enjoyed, he had no title to conclude for declarator of his sole and exclusive right to the whole sea-wreck, &c., upon it. Or at least he could not do so, upon the mere avowment of his own peaceable use and possession of the right of carrying off such sea-wreck, &c., for any length of time; because, unless he went farther, and averred that he had immemorially excluded all others from participating therein, his averment resolved merely into an allegation that he had peaceably enjoyed what it was equally competent to any other of the lieges peaceably to enjoy, without acquiring any right of an exclusive character at all.

The pursuer answered, 1st, The shore of the sea, being just a portion of the solum of the land, though subject to certain uses for the national objects of commerce and navigation, did truly belong in property to the landowner whose estate was washed by the sea, <sup>3</sup> and accordingly any coal or mineral found under the surface of the shore would undoubtedly belong to him; and so any drift or seaweed, found on the surface of the shore, equally belonged to him as accessories to the right of property which he possessed in the solum. It was not necessary for him to have any express grant of shore, or a description of his lands in his titles, as "bounded by the sea," in order to carry all these rights; they were carried by the clause of part and pertinent, and a large number of proprietors along the coast had enjoyed these rights from time immemorial on no other title. 2d, Seeing that the conveyance in the pursuer's titles possessed these legal effects, possession was sufficiently averred to warrant declarator as concluded for, if such possession was proved. It was averred to have been constant, peaceable, and uninterrupted, beyond the memory

LORD PRESIDENT.—I rather think, that in the circumstances of this case, it might have been more satisfactory to have had the precise state of possession cleared up first, before giving judgment as to the pursuer's title.

LORD MACKENZIE.—I think the first plea in law by the defenders should be repelled. I consider the heritable right of the pursuer, taken in connexion with his possession as averred on the record, to be sufficient to support his title to pursue.

LORD GILLIES.—The question is whether the pursuer has a good title to insist in this action, reference being had to the tenor of his heritable right and to his averments of possession. I think that he has. It has been found that a grant of land which was described as bounded by the sea, was good against a subsequent special Crown grant of the seashore. That must imply that the first grant comprehended the seashore. But then it is said that the pursuer's lands are not described in his title-deeds as bounded by the sea. But de facto they are notoriously part of the coast, and washed by the sea, and have been so for centuries. In such a case it would be a very serious matter indeed if this Court were to hold that the shore was reserved out of the grant, wherever it was not expressly inserted in it. I see no warrant for so construing a grant of lands on the seacoast. Take the case for instance of any island on the west coast, the island of Stronsay for example, and suppose that a disposition of that island was executed, but without inserting the words "bounded by the sea." Is it to be held that the omission of these words would produce the effect of reserving out of the conveyance of the island, a circle of seashore, which would have been contained in it, if the disposition of the island, had added that it was bounded by the sea? I do not think that any such effect would result from the omission of the words in question; and the mention of the sea-boundary should as little be material in the present case where it lies along one side of the pursuer's estate, as in the case supposed, where it surrounded the whole subject conveyed. I hold therefore that the conveyance of an estate, which is notoriously bounded by the sea, conveys the shore as effectually as if the words "bounded by the sea" were in the charter. And considering the great value of sea-wreck to properties lying along the coast, amounting often I believe, on the coast of the Forth to 15s. or 20s. per acre of what is next to the coast, it would be a very serious matter to cast a doubt on this doctrine, as I think it probable that the titles of many of the largest proprietors there may contain no words whatever expressly stating that the sea is their boundary, which is nevertheless notoriously the fact.

THE COURT then "repelled the defenders' objection to the title of the pursuer;" and remitted to the Lord Ordinary, to proceed, reserving expenses.

Acquiescence—Personal Objection.—Circumstances which held to infer acquiescence, and to bar a party, personal exceptions, from claiming a share of a division of which he was originally in right.

Process—Conjoining Actions.—A party having brought an action of reckoning and payment, the defender in which raised an action of relief against other parties,—Held incompetent to conjoin the two processes.

1837. By a settlement executed in 1773, the late Daniel Kerr of Greenock made over to his children certain heritable subjects, being the half estate of which he and one Ninian Spence, his partner in business, joint proprietors. Of one of these children, the pursuer, Daniel Gray is the son and representative.

Disputes having arisen between the representatives of Kerr and Spence as to their respective successions, and an accounting between them ensued, the defender, William Kerr, was in 1808 appointed judicial factor on the estate for the purpose of collecting the rents; and in this he continued till the end of 1823, when he was removed therefrom. At the commencement of his factory, a report had been given in by an accountant showing a balance due to the Spences by the Kerrs, upon which, while not yet approved of by the Court, Kerr paid over the whole rents to the Spences. A new remit, however, having been made by another accountant (Mr C. Ferrier), which terminated in a submission by that gentleman, the result as brought out by his decret-arbitral in 1824 was, that the Kerrs were entitled to receive one half of the rents of the property intromitted with by William Kerr, amounting to a sum of £10,000. Proceedings were thereupon instituted against him, for payment of the sum, which issued in a compromise, whereby he agreed to pay £7000 to Daniel Kerr's representatives in full of the balance found due to the pursuer by the accountant; and thereafter on payment, received a discharge.

Daniel Kerr Gray, who was a writer in Greenock, had in 1824 signed under his own hand, a disclamation of any interest in his grandfather's estate. He had been appointed factor on the property after the removal of William Kerr, and acted as such for a year, when he resigned in consequence of the embarrassed state of his affairs. He was at that time ignorant of his rights as a grandson of Daniel Kerr, and was cognizant of the subsequent proceedings of the other members of the family, in which, though not a party to them, or paying any share of the attendant expense acquiesced. He corresponded with their law-agent and adviser in 1824 burgh on the subject of the family affairs, and recommended and sanctioned the compromise with William Kerr on the terms and conditions which were ultimately agreed on.

Gray, v. Ke

Gray having thereafter raised a question as to his right to a share of the balance which had been made over to Daniel Kerr's representatives, they offered to pay to him, notwithstanding the disclamation by him in 1824 and subsequent acquiescence, his just proportion of what had been realized from the succession of their common ancestor, on his contributing his share of the expenses thereby incurred, and accounting for his own intromissions while factor. Not regarding this offer, Gray raised action against William Kerr, concluding, as one of the representatives of Daniel Kerr, for his share of the sum found due by Mr Ferrier to these parties, and for a count and reckoning in regard to his intromissions, while factor.

In defence against this action it was pleaded, inter alia—

In a question with the defender the pursuer is barred personali exceptione from insisting in the conclusions of the present action, in respect that rebus ipsis et factis, and in particular by his own express disclamation of all interest in the deceased Daniel Kerr's succession, and by knowledge of and non-appearance in the judicial proceedings therewith connected, as well as by his knowledge of and non-interference with the settlement which the defender made with the parties who had been all along put forward, even by the pursuer himself, as the representatives of Daniel Kerr, he is not now entitled to come forward and assert a right to which heretofore he has not only made no claim, but has expressly repudiated.

Two months after the raising of this action, William Kerr brought an action of relief against Mrs Elisabeth Kerr and the other representatives of Daniel Kerr who had concurred in the submission to Ferrier and the settlement with himself, concluding that the defenders should be ordained to free and relieve him of the sum concluded for in the former action, and of the alternative conclusion for count and reckoning.

Against this action it was pleaded in defence :—

1. The present process ought to be sisted till the issue of the principal action at Gray's instance.

2. The defenders are not, under the circumstances, bound to warrant the pursuer in the manner and to the extent now claimed; and in particular, they are not bound to warrant him indefinitely against the ascertainment of a large balance on a scrutiny of his factory accounts, the accuracy of which the defenders have never scrutinized, and which they are unable either to determine or to prove.

3. The pursuer having been the party who procured and produced, in a question with the defenders, the letter by Gray renouncing his interest in this succession, the defenders were entitled to rely on the validity of that letter as extinguishing Gray's claim.

4. The claim by Gray being to all appearance groundless, and the 1835. pursuer being in possession of materials sufficient, prima facie, to prove it so, the defenders are at least not bound to interfere in hoc statu.

Kerr.

The Lord Ordinary conjoined the two actions, in both of which a record was made up and closed, and pronounced the following interlocutor, with the subjoined note* :—" The Lord Ordinary having heard

* " The Lord Ordinary has proceeded on the assumption, that by the conjunction of the two processes, the defenders in the action of relief are substantially made co-defenders with William Kerr in the original action (in which it appears to him that they ought to have been the only defenders), and that it is, therefore, quite competent to settle the whole merits of the question as between them and Daniel Kerr Gray, the original pursuer in the conjoined processes. If he had not been satisfied of this, he would have found it unnecessary to give any judgment on the merits of the action of relief, in respect of the decree of absolvitor in the original action, and probably (though not without hearing him farther as to the competency) found Daniel Kerr Gray liable to both parties for the whole expenses of the conjoined actions, which had been occasioned entirely by his improper proceedings.

" On the merits, there seems no room for doubt. It is clear that the proceedings between the Kerrs and Spences embraced from the beginning, and indeed as their principal subject, the heritable property, the rents and profits of which are here in question, and that this fact, as well as his own relationship to the family, and contingent interest in the result of these proceedings, was all along known to the pursuer; though he might not have been correctly informed either as to the settlement of his grandfather, or the state of his mother's titles, up to a comparatively recent period. In consequence of the liberal concession of the other members of the family, it is now unnecessary to consider the effect of his absolute disclamation of any interest in his grandfather's succession in 1824, or of his proceedings when appointed judicial factor on the property but a few months after. What the Lord Ordinary rests upon is this, that there is complete evidence under his own hand, that after he was fully aware of his own rights, and of the whole proceedings in the submission, and while it appears, indeed, that he was privately contemplating his own probable interest in the result, he did not merely acquiesce in the management and proceedings of the other members of the family, but did, by his correspondence with Mr Macdonald, their law-agent in Edinburgh, advise, direct, and encourage them to settle and compromise with William Kerr, the defender, on the very terms and conditions on which they did ultimately settle with and discharge him. The proceedings he recommends in 1830 and 1831, and the compromise he advises in the end of that year (see letter of 29th December, 1831), were all of them measures which could only be carried through by those other members of the family who alone were parties to the submission at the former period, and alone entitled either to enforce the decree-arbitral, or to proceed with the accounting at the latter. By thus recognising them as administering, with his consent, for the general interest, and on the most favourable view for him, as taking burden on themselves for him, as well as the rest, he was obviously barred from objecting to any settlement they might come to with his acquiescence, or rather as the case is, with his approbation and advice, and in an especial manner, from afterwards coming against the third party, with whom they had so settled, and who had onerously purchased his discharge from the only parties legally entitled to deal with him, and on terms which the pursuer himself had previously sanctioned and approved.

" If, notwithstanding his express renunciation and long taciturnity, he was still entitled to claim any share of the family succession—which, but for the ~~honest~~ and honest admission of its other members might well have been questioned—it was clearly against them only, and not against the original holder of that succession, with whom they had openly settled, that his claim should have been directed.

parties at great length on the merits of the action at the instance of Daniel Kerr Gray against William Kerr, defender, and also on the state of the relative action of relief at the instance of the said William Kerr against Elizabeth Kerr and others, representatives of Daniel Kerr, deceased, and having made avizandum, and resumed consideration of the said processes, with the closed records, correspondence, and whole productions in each of them respectively, together with the minute given in to the original process in behalf of the defenders in the said action of relief—Conjoins the said two actions; and in the action by Daniel Kerr Gray against William Kerr, sustains the defences of the said William Kerr; assoilzies him from all the conclusions of the said action, and decerns: Finds the said Daniel Kerr Gray liable in the whole expenses incurred in the said original action: Allows an account thereof to be given in, and remits the same, when lodged, to the auditor, for his taxation and report. In the conjoined process, quoad ultra, and in the action of relief, finds that the defenders can only be liable in relief, or to the said Daniel Kerr Gray, to the extent and on the terms on which they had offered to settle with him before any litigation, and to which they have adhered on record, videlicet, to pay over to him his just share of

And such, accordingly, appears to have been his own impression; for in his remarkable letter to Mr Macdonald, of 6th August, 1834, though very much dissatisfied with William Kerr for actually paying over the money without consulting him individually, he evidently does not contemplate the possibility of any recourse upon him, but merely intimates his determination to raise an action of count and reckoning against ‘all the participators in that fund.’ The answer of his respectable correspondent, 13th August, 1834, is of itself a sufficient ground for the Lord Ordinary’s judgment. This old friend and honest adviser of the family, though himself a little out of humour at the sudden conclusion of the business before his own account was adjusted, points out to him confidentially the folly of his projected litigation, tells him that ‘his former disclamation of the succession was a sufficient reason for not consulting him before entering into the transaction;’ and that he himself, though put to inconvenience by the proceeding, was satisfied ‘that it had been done for the best, and found no fault with it;’ and ends by stating that there could be no need for litigation, and ‘that it was but fair that when you do claim the succession, you should pay your proportion of the expenses of procuring it.’ In the course of the same year, the representatives intimated formally, by letter of 4th December, 1834, that they were ready and willing to settle with him on these terms; and the result was, that in a month after, viz. 6th January, 1835, he, in order to avoid this equitable adjustment, passes by them altogether, and signets his summons against William Kerr only, against whom he concludes, without qualification, for his full share of the fund which had been realised at the expense of the other parties, and by whom he knew it had been wholly received, and onerously discharged. In the Lord Ordinary’s opinion, there could scarcely be a more reprehensible proceeding.

“If the interlocutor is taken to review, the party reclaiming should print the letters above referred to, especially those from the pursuer of 29th November, 1830, 29th December, 1831, and 6th August, 1834, Mr Coll Macdonald’s answer to that last letter, of the 13th August, and subsequent letter from the agent of the other representatives of Daniel Kerr, of 4th December, 1834, together, of course, with any other letters he may think material.”

No. 135. what had been realized from the succession of Daniel Kerr, their common ancestor, by and through the suits at law and submissions to arbiters referred to, upon his contributing his just share of the expenses incurred in thus realizing the said succession, and accounting for his own intrusions while acting as judicial factor on the property in dispute. But before further answer, appoints the cause to be enrolled, that parties may be heard as to the best way of ascertaining what may now be due to the said Daniel Kerr Gray under the preceding finding, and also on the claims for expenses (not herein before disposed of) by the parties generally, including therein the original defender, William Kerr's, claim against the said Daniel Kerr Gray, for the expenses of the action of relief, and those of the defenders in that action of relief, against both the said Daniel Kerr Gray and the said William Kerr."

Feb. 9, 1837.
Lockhart.

Gray reclaimed.

THE COURT had no doubts of the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor being well founded as to the principal cause; but held the conjunction of the two actions incompetent to the effect of rendering the conjoined process an action of count and reckoning at the instance of Daniel Kerr Gray against the other Kerrs.

THEIR LORDSHIPS accordingly pronounced as follows:—"Adhere to the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary in the original action of count and reckoning at the instance of Daniel Kerr Gray, of new find the defender, William Kerr, entitled to expenses, allow the account to be given in, and thereafter taxed in common form; quoad ultra, recal the conjunction of the process of relief with said process of count and reckoning, and the other findings of the interlocutor, and remit to the Lord Ordinary to proceed farther in the said process of relief as to him shall seem just."

Process—Intimation—Entail.—Where a petition for carrying into effect a private Act of Parliament, relative to an entail, has been intimated under the notices required by the act, the Court will not allow its prayer to be altered without ordering a new set of notices, in terms of the act.

Feb. 9, 1837.
1ST DIVISION.

A PETITION was presented by Sir Norman Macdonald Lockhart, heir of entail in possession of Lee and Carnwath, and John M'Neille of Bally-Castle and others, trustees for carrying into execution a private Act of had been discovered which would cause an additional sum to be carried to the credit of the last heir's representatives. The petitioner had prayed, inter alia, for warrant to uplift and pay certain sums of the state of accounts then made up; and the minute now granted in terms of the amended state of accounts. The leading of the petition, which was for authority to execute an entail of the purchase of which had been previously approved by the Court, unaltered by the minute.

MACKENZIE.—I think it would endanger the whole procedure if the petition was granted in terms which were at all varied from those which had been intimated under the notices prescribed by the act. Even the least variation would be perilous. The petition necessarily required to be so intimated; and it has been intimated but the petition as originally presented. There is nothing before us which we can regularly grant.

HILLIES.—I am of the same opinion. The alteration now proposed is not warranted by the prayer of the petition as it stands. But we cannot go beyond the prayer; we cannot grant what is ultra petita. And if the prayer of the petition is not granted at all there must be a new set of notices in terms of the act.

THE PRESIDENT concurred.

The petitioner then intimated that he would amend the petition in his next minute, and give a new set of notices of the petition as amended, which was accordingly allowed.

Entail—Clause—Adjudication.—The prohibitory clause in an entail executed in 1664, was thus expressed: "It shall noways be lawful to any of the heirs and provision above specified to sell, dispose, or wadset the lands above any part thereof, or any annual rents, or yearly duties to be uplifted furth saimen, or to set tacks for longer space than their own lifetimes, or to contract for which the samen may be apprized or adjudged, or to do any other fact in prejudice of the said tailzie and of the persons above named, and the saids;"—Held, that this clause contained an effectual prohibition against the succession.

- 2, 1837. ON the 4th of November, 1664, Sir James Stewart of Strath

By that deed he bound himself "William Stewart, my second lawful son, and the heirs-male fully to be procreated of his body," and a certain order of heirs of The prohibitory, irritant, and resolute clauses were in these terms: "And it shall noways be leisome nor lawful to any of the heirs and provision above specified to sell dispone and wadsett the baronie and others above written or any part thereof or any annual or yearly duties to be uplifted furth of the samen, or to sett tacks for longer space than their own lifetimes, or to contract debt for the samen may be apprized or adjudged, or to do any other fact in prejudice of the said tailzie and of the persons above named aforesaid, and if my saids daughters, and their heirs or any of heirs of tailzie and provision above specified shall in any time failzie therein, or do any thing contrair to this my destination pointment, then and in that case the person or persons sua failzie doing in the contrair hereof and the heirs of their bodies shall alose their right and haill benefit of this present bond of provision feftments following hereon, and of the haill lands baronie and others written, and the samen shall in all time thereafter pertain belacress to the next person for the time, who be virtue of the said and provision would have succeeded to the saids lands and estate, ing the saids persons contraveners and the heirs of their bodies dispositions and other deeds whomsoever made or done contrasaid provision and destination with all that shall follow thereon ipso facto voyd and null without any declarator and shall noways nor burden the saids lands baronie and others above written or thereof as if the samen had never been done, with and upon the

Under this entail the succession opened to the late David Earl of Buchan, who was served heir of entail and provision in 1768. After enjoying the lands on this title till 1819, his Lordship, being advised that the entail was invalid, executed a procuratory for resigning the lands in favour of himself, his heirs, and assignees. He then obtained a charter of resignation, and made up a title as unlimited fiar, after which he executed a trust-conveyance of the estate to Alexander Monypenny, W.S. After his Lordship's death, the next heir under the entail of Sir James Stewart was Henry David, now Earl of Buchan. Mrs Susan Rowe of London-Colney, in the county of Herts, being a creditor of the present Earl, adjudged his whole right and interest in the lands contained in the entail, and particularly his right to reduce the deeds executed by David Earl of Buchan to the prejudice of the entail. She then raised a reduction of these deeds, and pleaded, that, as there was no set form of words or style essential to an entail, and as the entail of 1664 contained distinct and substantive prohibitions against selling, contracting debt, or doing "any other fact or deed in prejudice of the said tailzie, and of the persons above named and their foresaids," this last prohibition was clearly and effectually directed against the alteration of the order of succession. There were many entails, and especially that of Roxburghe, in which a similar clause had been so construed, both here and in the House of Lords. The three essential prohibitions being thus expressed, they were duly fenced by irritant and resolute clauses which, although general in their terms, yet directly and necessarily applied to the whole prohibitory clause. And thus the entail was perfectly valid, and the deeds of David Earl of Buchan were ultra vires and must be reduced.

The defender pleaded, as his first defence, that, in construing an entail, every clause which was susceptible of more than one interpretation, must be read in the sense least favourable to the imposition of fetters: and, in particular, if there was not a substantive and express prohibition against each of the three distinct acts of selling, contracting debt, or altering the succession, no such prohibition could be reared up by any inference or implication. The mere prohibition to do any deed "in prejudice of the tailzie, and of the persons above named," did not, either necessarily or naturally, imply a prohibition to alter the order of succession, more than it implied a prohibition to sell, or a prohibition to contract debt, or a prohibition to commit a crime inferring forfeiture of the estate, all and each of which might most truly be said to be "in prejudice of the tailzie and of the persons above named." But if this were true, there was no substantive prohibition against altering the succession, there were no other words in the deed which could apply to it, but a prohibition against "prejudice of the tailzie:" and, unless it

136. could be maintained that these general words were enough to supply the place of any substantive prohibition to sell, or to contract debt, &c., there was no ground for holding them tantamount to a substantive prohibition against altering the order of succession. The entail was therefore defective in this essential particular, and the late Lord Buchan having, by resignation, obtained an investiture in favour of a different order of succession, had withdrawn the lands from under the entail, and, as a fee simple proprietor, had validly executed the deeds under reduction.

The second defence was rested on an alleged defect in the irritant clause.

The Lord Ordinary found "that the entail on which the action had been raised does not contain any effectual prohibition against altering the order of succession; therefore, sustained the first defence, assoilzied the defenders, and decerned; and found the pursuers liable in expenses."

The pursuers reclaimed, and printed for the use of the Court the terms of the prohibitory clause in the Roxburghe entail, and several other entails. That of the Roxburghe entail was thus expressed:—"To make or grant any alienation, disposition, or other right or security whatsoever, of the said lands, lordship, baronies, estate, and living above specified, nor of no part thereof, nather zitt to contract debts, nor do our deeds qrbv the samen, or any part thereof, may be appraisit, adjudgit, or evicted fra them, nor zitt to do any other thing, in hurt and prejudice of their prtis, and of the foresaid tailzie and succession, in hail or in part."

In the argument under the reclaiming note, the defender attempted to shake the authority of the Roxburghe case, and also contended that the structure of its prohibitory clause was materially different from that of the prohibitory clause in this entail, particularly as the three substantive prohibitions were distinctly marked as such by the introduction of the words "nor yet" between each of them, so as to make them distinct and separate clauses, each referring to one of the three main subjects of prohibition.

The pursuer answered, that the authority of the Roxburghe case was impregnable, and that its prohibitory clause was not distinguishable in any material particular from the prohibitory clause in this entail.

* "NOTE.—After the repeated discussions which this class of cases has undergone, the Lord Ordinary conceives that it would be idle to attempt to give any exposition of the general principles in the structure of entails, or in their interpretation. Under the operation of these principles, each case must depend on its own particular words; and he need only say, on examining the terms of this deed, and comparing it with the others on which the Court has decided on the efficacy of prohibitory clauses, he can find no ground for holding that there was a valid prohibition against altering the order of succession. This being sufficient to dispose of the case, he has abstained purposely from considering the second defence."

LORD PRESIDENT.*—I have gone through every case that has followed since the passing of the act 1685, every case that I could find in the books, and I was sorry to see that your Lordships' decisions are by no means uniform or consistent; and I think that this has happened very much from wandering out of the Act of Parliament, and making use of phrases not mentioned in the act. There is not in the act 1685, c. 22, one word about altering the order of succession positively and specifically; neither is there any thing, as in the case of Roxburghe, about a distinct positive clause. In that case the words of the entail were, "nor zitt to do any thing, in hurt and prejudice of their prties;" but the words of the statute are just of the same import, "or do any other deed whereby the samen may be apprysed, &c.," the same as in this tailzie here. The act goes on, "or the succession frustrate or interrupted." Now that clearly implies that not only a positive absolute alteration of the succession by a specific deed is prohibited, but that it also applies to any other deed, whether a voluntary act or an act on which diligence has followed. It is not said in the act that the order of succession shall not be altered; but that the succession shall not be frustrated or interrupted, and I am persuaded if our predecessors had attended to the words of the act, there would not have been that discrepancy in the decisions which I am sorry to find. Here are the words of the act, "or do any other deed whereby the samen may be apprysed, adjudged, or evicted from the others substitute in the tailzie, or the succession frustrate or interrupted." That is any deed whatever, whether a voluntary deed or some deed on which diligence follows. I did think at first on looking at the case of Roxburghe, that the words "nor zitt" repeated, did make something like a separation, but when I referred to the Act of Parliament, I saw that was not required. The terms of it are that you must not allow the estate to be apprized, adjudged, evicted, &c. or any other deed done by which the succession may be frustrate or interrupted. Now what are the words here, "or to do any other fact or deed in prejudice of the said tailzie, and of the persons above named and their foresaids." The words are disjunctive; and what are "their foresaids" but the substitutes; and to make it plainer it goes on to prohibit any thing done "contrair to this my destination and appointment." And then it goes on at page eighth, "and all dispositions and other deeds whatsoever, made or done contrair to the said provision and destination with all that shall follow thereon, shall be ipso facto voyd and null, &c." In short, I can make no distinction between this and the case of Roxburghe. There may be some other cases of a contrary import, because the decisions are not uniform. I saw one in the year 1728, in which it is said expressly, although I do not know whether that would do now, that a prohibition to alter the order of succession might be implied. I do not know whether that would be found now, but it was found then; and, therefore, recurring to the words of the Act of Parliament, which I think we should always recur to, there is not indeed a positive clause about altering the order of succession, but there is one against the same being frustrate or interrupted. On the whole, I propose that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary be recalled.

LORD GILLIES.—I concur with your Lordship in the conclusion you have arrived at. I am afraid there is too much truth as to the inconsistency, or apparent inconsistency, of some of those decisions; but, amidst this inconsistency, I am glad to look at the case of Roxburghe, the judgment in which was most deliberately pronounced, and adhered to, on a petition and answers, and finally affirmed by the House of Lords. I consider that decision as a sort of resting place, and I see that, in all the cases that have since occurred, it has been always admitted that the judgment was a sound and a proper judgment. I have only therefore, to look at the Roxburghe case and this case, for I think they are identical; and though there may be some difference in the verbal expression, yet the correct grammatical import and logical effect of the words is exactly the same in both. "To do any other fact or deed" is the prohibition in the one case, while in the other, the Roxburghe, it is "to do any other thing." Now, is there such a difference between "thing" and between "fact or deed?" In the Roxburghe case it is "in hurt and prejudice of their parts and of the present tailzie and succession," and here it is "in prejudice of the said tailzie." Now, I conceive "tailzie" to be vox signata, because "tailzie" means a destination of heirs different from the legal order. Again, there does not appear to me to be any distinction between beginning the sentence with "nor" or with "or." I may say I have had no difficulty in this case, either on reading those papers or in hearing the counsel; or, I may say, I have not had any difficulty in reading those papers, nor yet on listening to the able argument of the Dean. Therefore, as to the "nor yet" and the "or," I am not able to see that, whether the one expression or the other be used, it makes the smallest difference on the true meaning or legal import of the clause. In short, it appears to me that the two cases cannot be distinguished. And holding, as it has always been held, that the judgment in the Roxburghe case was right, I am forced to conclude that the interlocutor in this case is wrong. Resting, therefore, on the case of Roxburghe, which I consider to be perfect authority, I think we must alter the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary.

LORD MACKENZIE.—I agree with the opinion expressed by your Lordship. I think, whether looking at the statute or the case of Roxburghe, that opinion is right. The statute provides that, in entails, there shall be prohibitions of alienation, contraction of debt, and against doing any thing by which the succession may be frustrate or interrupted. It does not require three clauses entirely separate and distinct. The words of the statute are, "that it shall be lawful to his Majesty's subjects to tailzie their lands and estates, and to substitute heirs in their tailzies, with such provisions and conditions as they shall think fit, and to affect the said tailzies with irritant and resolute clauses, whereby it shall not be lawful to the heirs of tailzie to sell, annailzie, or dispoise the said lands, or any part thereof, or contract debt, or do any other deed whereby the same may be apprysed, adjudged, or evaded from the others substitute in the tailzie, or the succession frustrate or interrupted," &c. Now, here the prohibitions are not entirely separated, and we cannot, therefore, hold that they must be so in entails sanctioned by that statute. Then it cannot be argued that it was necessary in deeds of entail to use the precise words expressed in the statute. It is quite fixed that prohibitions in substance agreeing with those expressed in the statute are sufficient; and in the present instance, indeed, it would be particularly hard to require that, because this deed was made in 1664, previous to the statute. As the statute did not annul such entails, it must have sanctioned them, though made in words differing from those which were not in existence to be copied by the entailers. The question then is, whether this entail does not contain expressed in substance those statutory prohibitions? I agree with your Lordship, that it does contain them. The statute requires a prohibition No. 138 against selling or disposing the lands, or contracting debt, or doing any other Feb. 9, 183 deed whereby the same may be apprized, &c., or the succession frustrate or inter- Rowe v.

 rupted. The clause in the present entail, after the prohibition of alienation and Monypenny contraction of debt "prohibits to do any other fact or deed in prejudice of the said tailzie and of the persons above named and their foressaids." Now I can see no solid argument by which it is possible to deny that the words "in prejudice of the said tailzie" are in substance the same as the words of the statute "or the succession frustrate or interrupted." I think "prejudice" equal to "frustrate or interrupt," and "tailzie" equal to "succession." Under this statute, even if it were an open question, I should have held that such an entail as this was valid.
 It is said that the words "altering the order of succession" should have been used, but these are not the words of the statute, and I do not know that "altering the order of succession" is a perfect expression. There may be deeds frustrating the succession which may be said not to be alterations of the order of succession, and if an extremely rigid line of argument were used, it might perhaps be held that a prohibition of alteration was not sufficient under the statute. The words used in this entail seem better. And I may further observe that the clauses used here are exactly in the order of the statutory prohibitions. First, there is undoubtedly a prohibition of alienation, then there is a prohibition against the contraction of debt, and then, exactly as in the statute, there is a third prohibition, not entirely separated from the second, but just as much so as the statutory prohibition of frustrating or interrupting the succession. In the next place, I agree with Lord Gillies in thinking that the Roxburghe case is a precedent fully in point. The use of the words in the Roxburghe entail, "nor zitt," I consider to be of no consequence whatever. Your Lordship has observed that they are not in the statute, nor can I see that "nor yet" is at all better than "or." Neither can I think that "prejudice to the tailzie" is at all different in effect from "prejudice to the tailzie and succession." I therefore think the Roxburghe case quite in point, and I am not aware that it has ever been attempted to overturn the authority of that case.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Alter the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary reclaimed against; find that the entail, on which the action has been raised, contains an effectual prohibition against frustrating the succession, and therefore repel the first defence; find the defenders liable to the pursuer in the expense of this part of the litigation, and remit to the auditor, &c.; quoad ultra, remit to the Lord Ordinary to proceed farther in the cause as shall be just."

Process—Entail—Stat. 6 and 7 Wil. IV. c. 42.—An application to the Court under the 6th and 7th Wil. IV. c. 42, for authority to sell entailed lands for the purpose of paying the entailer's debts having been intimated in the newspapers as provided by the statute, the Court farther appointed the petition to be intimated in the minute book and on the walls for eight days, and granted warrant for serving it on the next heir of entail, not being a descendant of the petitioner's body.*

1st DIVISION.

By the act 6th and 7th Wil. IV. c. 42, it is declared to be lawful for the heirs of entail in the possession of any entailed estate liable to be adjudged or evicted for the entailer's debts to apply by summary petition to the Court to have so much of the lands sold as will produce a sum adequate to discharge the debts so affecting the estate. The Court are by sec. 8th "authorised and required, upon such petition being presented, to direct due notice, according to the practice of the said Court, to be given of such petition to all concerned." By section 21st, provision is made in regard to the notices to be given of the intended sale in the newspapers; "and where such application shall be to the Court of Session, the said Court or the Lord Ordinary shall, if they or he shall see cause, cause such further intimation thereof to be made in the minute-book of the said Court, or on the walls of the Parliament House, or otherwise, as the said Court or Lord Ordinary shall think proper."

The late John M'Mikin executed an entail of the estate of Kilsaintninan on certain heirs of his body, whom failing, in other heirs. He died in 1801 leaving debts to the amount, as was afterwards ascertained, of £8200, to meet which there were no funds other than the entailed property. In a declarator brought by his sister, Mrs M'Mikin Torrance, the petitioner, to whom the succession opened, the Court found that the entailer's debts formed a charge against the estate and against the heirs of tailzie succeeding thereto.

Mrs Torrance, being desirous to have as much of the property sold as should be sufficient to discharge the debts, took steps for having an application to that effect made to the Court in terms of the act above-mentioned, and caused notice thereof to be inserted in the proper newspapers.

She thereafter presented an application in terms of the statute, praying the Court "to take the foregoing application into consideration, and to direct such notice of it to be given to all concerned, and to cause such farther intimation to be made in the minute-book, or on the walls or otherwise, as accords with the practice of the Court, and as your Lordships shall think proper;" and thereafter to take an account of and ascertain the amount of debt affecting the estate, and authorize such portions thereof to be sold as should be sufficient to discharge the debt.

granted an acknowledgment to that effect, and had the bill thereafter ates in part payment of the bill, which now amounted to £515, and (Signed) "John and Wright Southgate."

In 1817, Southgates, Montgomerie being nominal plaintiff, instituted proceedings against Eivers in the Supreme Court of New York, where he then resided, for recovery of the balance remaining due under his obligation of 16th May, 1810, transferred to them by Montgomerie. The plaintiff was nonsuited owing to his failure to prove that the appropriated fund for the original payment of the claim had failed.

A second suit was raised in the same court by the pursuers, also in name of the defender as nominal plaintiff, and the proceedings in that suit resulted in Eivers being assolized with costs (April, 1822); three of the jurors, to whom a reference was made, having reported that there remained in the hands of Montgomerie, funds belonging to Eivers, arising out of the joint-adventure, sufficient to have paid in full the whole sum contained in the obligation of 16th May.

Pending these proceedings, Eivers raised action against Montgomerie (January, 1820) in the town-court of Frederick-Stadt in St Croix, for payment of an alleged balance due to him on account of the joint-adventure, which ended in a judgment (November, 1820) finding that, credit being given for the payment of £200, there remained a certain balance due to Montgomerie. To this action the Southgates were in no way parties.

Having failed in their suit against Eivers, the Southgates, in 1822, filed a bill in the Court of Chancery of New York against Montgomerie and Eivers as co-defendants, concluding for payment by one or other of them of the balance still due on the bill of exchange. Montgomerie, who was out of the jurisdiction of the Court, being still resident in St Croix, employed a professional adviser and consented to put in answers to the bill; these were sent to him with a commission from the Chancellor at New York to take his affidavit as to their verity, and were lodged in the course of 1824. Eivers also appeared as a defendant in the suit. In his pleadings it was stated that funds of his to a great extent still remained in the hands of Montgomerie; and a view of his accounts was given, in regard to the joint-adventure, at variance with the result of the judgment in the court of St Croix, of which he denied the authority. Muthgate v.
Montgomerie.

2. Even supposing that judgment not to be conclusive against the defender in the present action, it must at all events be held to constitute a prima facie case against him, to the effect of throwing upon him the burden of proving that the said judgment is erroneous.

3. The facts stated by the defender, so far as they are well founded, do not show the said judgment to be erroneous; but that, on the contrary, all the facts of the case go to show the justice and equity of it.

4. In the circumstances of the case the sum pursued for must have been held to be due either by the defender or by Eivers, according as it might appear that the proceeds of their joint-adventure was or was not sufficient for the payment of it.

The Lord Ordinary, after ordering cases, pronounced the following interlocutor, with the subjoined note: *—" Finds that the judgment

* " 1. The doctrine of the pursuers would put foreign decrees entirely on a footing with final decrees of our own courts; for even those are examinable in all the particulars as to which they would allow the others to be examined. That is, as to their authenticity, the competency or jurisdiction of the court; their being in absence, or being chargeable with material irregularities. There might be great convenience in such a rule, on account of its precision and simplicity; and there is no doubt an appearance of authority for it in some late English cases. But the Lord Ordinary cannot discover that the comitas (on which the whole authority of foreign judgments rests) has ever been carried to this extent in Scotland, and the most recent of all the English decisions, that given by the Lord Chancellor in the appeal, Houlditch v. Lord Donegal, on the 8th and 16th July last, 1834, in which the whole matter was very deliberately considered, seems to limit it very nearly as in the preceding interlocutor, and as the Lord Ordinary humbly thinks it must be limited, in order to reconcile the general principle with justice, or different particular judgments with each other.

" To understand the nature of these limitations, certain distinctions must be attended to, and it is apprehended to be pretty clear, that the apparent conflict of some of the decisions and judicial dicta that have been cited, may be satisfactorily explained by referring to these distinctions.

" Where the facts are admitted, and the law to be applied to them is confessedly that of the court which issues the decree, the rule laid down by the pursuers may in general be safely applied. If such a case (from a change in the defender's residence) had come for decision in the courts of another country, the law of the state where the cause of action arose must have been put in evidence and applied, without regard to its discrepancy with that of the other country. But as there can in general be no better (or scarcely ever so good) evidence of a foreign law, as the final decrees of the courts which daily administer it, the mere production of such a decree, with an admission of the facts, should, in most cases, exclude all further enquiry, and warrant the instant interposition of the local authority for its execution; and upon this ground, accordingly, many decisions have apparently been given. But, even in this class of cases, it might be hazardous to hold the rule as absolutely fixed and inflexible. As to the decrees of supreme courts, in large and instructed communities, it would scarcely ever admit of question; but, in less civilized states, judgments, of inferior tribunals especially, may proceed on the grossest mistakes of their own law, and, while the means of domestic review may be lost, by change of domicile or otherwise, the Lord Ordinary sees no principle on which the courts of other countries should be excluded from allowing such error to be established, by reference to living authothat foreign law, confessedly of greater weight than the judge whose decree ght before them.

t there is another description of cases, where the right to question the of a foreign decree seems still more necessary and undeniable. Suppose brought to trial in France between two Scotchmen domiciled in that coun-arising out of transactions in Scotland, and confessedly to be decided by of that country; and suppose the law of Scotland to be put in evidence gely, by the testimony of lawyers; but that, either through their ignorance, misapprehension of their testimony by the court, judgment is given, pro-according to the law of Scotland, but really in opposition to its best hed principles. The judgment, however, is final, the court undoubtedly ent, and the procedure regular. But before it is carried into effect, the return to their own country, and application is made to the courts here ction on this foreign decree. Could it possibly be maintained that our e courts shall be bound to give effect to a plain mistake or perversion of wn law, to the prejudice of their own subjects, because embodied in a decree? This the Lord Ordinary should humbly think a very clear at there are others, more likely perhaps to occur (and he believes the pre-be substantially of this description), in which it might often be necessary y the same principle; where the law according to which the case should be l is neither that of the country in which the decision is given, nor of that h execution is craved, but a foreign law, as to both: In such a case, the pronouncing the decree has no prerogative, or presumptive advantage, over which it is proposed to be reviewed; and the question comes to be, more y than in any other situation, one of pure comitas on the one hand, and of to do complete and substantial justice on the other. In such a situation, d rather seem that no positive or inflexible rule could be safely adopted, at the matter must be left to the sound discretion of the court applied to, ng to the circumstances of each particular case. If the court issuing the be one of high authority, and belong to a country closely connected with which the cause of action arose, its judgments should scarcely be question-a court of inferior authority, and with less occasion to know the law applio the cause. A judgment of the Court of King's Bench, upon a question tch law, might be implicitly adopted in Sicily or South America without of injustice. But it would be a very different thing if the judgment of a t Messina or Valparaiso, on a point of English law, should be presented to urt of Session as sufficient per se to warrant an order for execution, without amination of its merits.

ich are the considerations which arise when a foreign decree is impugned as or of law, and the course is not much clearer where error of fact is im-

Evidence newly discovered, it is presumed, must always be admitted
: such a decree; for upon such evidence final judgments of our own courts e opened up, and new trials granted after verdict. But in the case of a decree, should the strict tests of noviter veniens be applied? or should a called on to grant execution ex comitate, be debarred from looking at con-evidence (suppose written evidence) of its injustice, tendered to them with it, although it should appear that such evidence might possibly have roduced before the decree was issued? The competency of the evidence y produced (or rejected) is matter of law, and falls under the former head.

the successful party. If the evidence is not upon record, the presumption may be nearly insurmountable, that it was sufficient to warrant the decision. But if it is accessible, the Lord Ordinary is inclined to think that it may always be looked at by the Court before granting execution, and that it should not be granted if it be palpably and plainly insufficient to support the judgment. A foreign decree has authority enough, if, in so far as it proceeds upon facts, it is put upon a footing with a verdict obtained in our own courts. But such a verdict may be quashed as contrary to evidence (or to the justice of the case), although there is no other record of the testimonies than the notes of the presiding judge.

"2. It is upon these views that the preceding interlocutor has been framed, and it is easy to explain their application. The first peculiarity in the case is, that the cause of action arose, not in the state of New York, but in the Danish island of St Croix, or St Thomas, and that the defender was not amenable to the jurisdiction of the New York Chancery. The law applicable to the case, therefore, was not the law of New York, but the law of the Danish island, and the courts of New York had originally no power over the defender. It has been stated, indeed, that the defender prorogated the jurisdiction of the court by voluntarily appearing and pleading before it, and the Lord Ordinary is inclined to think that this is a good answer to the last part of the speciality referred to. Even this, however, is not free from doubt; and it seems certain, that, in submitting himself to its jurisdiction as a co-defender with Eivers, he had no thought of consenting to have his case tried as the sole defender, after Eivers had been assimilated, or to peril the result on Eivers' testimony as the only witness in the cause. By consenting to plead at all, he probably exposed himself to this consequence. But the consideration of its never having been intended, appears to the Lord Ordinary (along with the foreign nature of the transaction) to put this decree in a far lower rank as to authority than if it had been pronounced in a suit between two residents in New York, upon a transaction occurring within the bounds of the state.

"But what has mainly weighed with the Lord Ordinary, in requiring further examination into the grounds of this decree, is the strong impression he has of the force of the evidence against it, and the utter insufficiency, as it appears to him, of that upon which it seems to have proceeded.

"The Lord Ordinary is not of opinion that the St Croix decree can be regarded as a proper res judicata between the present parties, or that the Court of New York should have dealt with it as a foreign decree of binding authority, because the suit in which it was pronounced, though involving precisely the same question, was not between the same parties; but, short of being absolutely conclusive of the cause, it does appear to him a document of the very highest authority, and entitled to much more regard than all the other evidence he can find in the cause.

"The whole question at issue at New York was, Whether the defender had any funds belonging to Eivers unaccounted for in his hands? If he had, he was bound to pay them to the pursuers; if he had not, Eivers was bound to make good the deficiency. Now, in order to settle this very question, Eivers himself, in contemplation of the pursuers' second suit against him, had, in 1820, raised an action of accounting against the defender in the island of St Croix, where the defender is domiciled; where all the dealings between them had occurred; and where Eivers himself was personally present when the action began; and in this action he had exhibited an account showing the defender to be indebted to him in the sum of 8245 Danish dollars, after giving him credit for the whole amount of the pursuers' original debt of £515, 11s. The defender, on the other hand, had exhibited his state of the account, by which he showed that, after taking credit more of the pursuers' debt than the £200 which he had actually paid them, was his debtor for about 200 dollars.

A court thus selected by Eivers, and unquestionably the radical and proper for such a question, appears to have gone very minutely into the account, taking the benefit of the proceedings in a previous reference to arbiters of the parties, ultimately gave judgment in favour of the defender, and that, by the payment of £200 to the pursuers, and the other payments established, he had more than exhausted all the funds belonging to Eivers in his hand and was his creditor for a balance of 191 dollars; and in this judgment acquiesced, in so far, at least, as never to seek to have it reviewed or altered to the present day.

Between Eivers and the defender, therefore, this was a proper res judicata, as produced in any foreign Court where those two parties might afterwards meet, was, beyond all dispute, a foreign decree of the first class of authority. Both these parties were litigants in the New York Court of Chancery; and they stood there as co-defenders, yet the point at issue with the pursuers by the very same with that in the suit between those two defenders, as adversaries, at St Croix, viz. What was the true state of accounts between them, whether the present defender still held funds of Eivers unaccounted for in his hand.

But not only was the question the same as in the St Croix suit, but in the interest was the same also; the only interest at issue at New York, that of the two co-defenders, as against each other. The debt of the pursuers was not disputed; and the only point to be decided, therefore, was, which of the defenders should be liable for it? It was the converse of a multipointing, in which the pursuers had no proper opponent, and the whole litigation was between those called as defenders; whatever was res judicata, therefore, or a binding decision as between them, was substantially decisive of the cause; and though it might not, perhaps, be strictly sustained as absolutely binding on the pursuers, it was near it as possible, and, at all events, afforded evidence which seemed to admit of contradiction.

Now, as the Lord Ordinary reads the proceedings in the New York Chancery, he cannot find that the authority of this decree against Eivers is impugned by any evidence but the evidence of Eivers himself; and he certainly cannot reconcile it with notions of justice, that it should be rebutted, or held to be overruled, by the testimony. The pursuers say, indeed, in their case, that there was other evidence produced in the Chancery, which is not noticed in the record, and may be inaccessible. If this be so, the Lord Ordinary expects that they will make necessary explanations and offer of proof at the enrolment. But at present he cannot understand how it should be so.

The exemplification in process is produced by the pursuers themselves, as a copy of all the proceedings; and it certainly contains abundance of useless tails and repetitions; and, as all depositions of witnesses, in a Court of equity, are understood to be taken in writing, it is not easy to suppose that any of this kind has been omitted. There are references, no doubt, in the depositions and answers, to evidence produced in the two former suits against Eivers not law; but as the defender was no party to those suits, they cannot affect him, therefore, looking through the whole voluminous proceedings, the Lord Ordinary really sees nothing to oppose to the St Croix decree but the oath of Eivers, the real party in the cause.

The nature of that oath, too, is not a little remarkable. While still a joint defender with the present defender, he made oath (as was necessary) to the verity of the statements, which contained the substantive averment, that the defender had the funds to a great extent in his hands; and when afterwards called as a

140. been pronounced in absence of the defender, or of material irregularities and informalities in the course of the proceedings, but also by proof of its having proceeded on error of fact, or even on error of law, more especially where the law applicable to the case was not the proper law of the country where the suit was tried and determined: Finds that the defender in this case has already impugned the said decree, on several of the grounds above stated, to such an extent as to make it necessary that its merits, in those particulars, should be farther enquired into and examined; and, therefore, before further answer, appoints the cause to be enrolled, that parties may come prepared to state what further evidence or argument they respectively require on the points mentioned in the third part of the annexed note, or on any other points in the cause."

The pursuers reclaimed.

When the case was first put out for advising (June 19, 1835), the Court, considering the general point involved in it, as to the effect to be given to a foreign decree when founded on for execution, to be one of great importance, ordered a hearing.

witness for the pursuers, he produces the very account upon which he had libelled his unfortunate action at St Croix in 1820; and, after swearing generally that it was correct, proceeds, in the rest of the deposition, to explain and maintain the whole of the different items of which it is composed; and so makes out, by his own oath, that the balance then unsuccessfully claimed by him of 3245 dollars was notwithstanding justly due. The account is engrossed, first at page 81 of the exemplification, as part of the St Croix decree, and again at page 106, as exhibit No. I. produced at Eivers' deposition in the Chancery of New York. The two copies are verbatim et literatim the same, and the last as well as the first bears date at St Croix, 24th January, 1820, being the very date of instituting the action in that island. To the Lord Ordinary it appears incomprehensible how, without any reference to oath, the single and unsupported deposition of a party to the verity of a claim, which, after full investigation, had been totally rejected by the decree of a competent Court, should, though receivable, be held as better proof of the fact than that final and unchallenged decree.

"3d, The points to which the Lord Ordinary wishes the parties to speak at next calling are,—1st, The pursuers to state and explain what further evidence, beyond the deposition of Eivers and relative accounts, was produced to the Chancellor at New York, and how such evidence (if there was any) is to be recovered. 2dly, To state and explain what further evidence they can now bring in support of their decree, and to rebut the effect of the judgment at St Croix in 1821. 3dly, The defender to be farther heard (if he shall so desire) upon his pleas, that the Chancellor of New York had no jurisdiction over him after Eivers ceased to be a co-defender—his prorogation of the jurisdiction being only on the supposition that he was to continue a party, and, consequently, not to be made a witness against him—and on this plea, that the St Croix decree was truly res judicata in such a case as this, even as against the pursuers. 4thly, The defender to explain farther what he offers to prove as to the extinction of the pursuers' claim against him through lapse of time, supposing it otherwise good. 5thly, To state what farther proof, beyond the St Croix decree, he is now ready to bring in support of his defence."

Lord Braxfield in Watson v. Renton,<sup>1</sup> and the course of recent decisions No. 14
 has tended practically to fix the point in conformity with his opinion:— Feb. 9, 18
 “ I have a res judicata in England freeing me from a demand; I come Southgate to Scotland; can I be taken up there on an action upon the same ground? Montgomerie No. A res judicata is good all the world over. The Courts here have no right to review this final judgment. On the other hand, if I want execution on an English decree, the other party cannot defend himself against it, otherwise than by showing that the decree is unjust by the law of England. If the decree be liable to review, it must be reviewed in England. If there be a judgment in the last resort, it can go no farther.
 A man cannot be forced to go through every country in Europe with his defence.” Unless it can be shown by the defender that there is something objectionable in a foreign decree founded on for execution, either with reference to the authority of the Court by which it was pronounced, the mode in which it was obtained, or the matter to which it relates, it would be inconsistent with general principle, and contrary to authority to refuse it effect, or examine the grounds on which it rests.<sup>2</sup> There is great practical difficulty in the way of the application of a contrary principle; a foreign judgment being generally founded on the law of the country where it was pronounced, by which law it must be tried, it is impossible to suppose that better evidence can be had than the judgment itself, of its being according to law and justice: And the same holds, when the judgment rests on the ground of certain facts having been considered as legally established in the foreign court; for the facts of the case (the legal meaning of the expression) must depend essentially on the law of evidence peculiar to the foreign state, and the party called to support his decree may besides be unable to get at the original evidence. The view according to which a foreign judgment is to be regarded as afford-

40. ing prima facie evidence in favour of the party holding it, and throwing
 837. the onus probandi on the other side,<sup>1</sup> is liable to the same objections;
 R v. for example, taking the case of a party pursuing a declarator founded on Inola. a decree of absolutor obtained in a foreign Court, the onus remains here exactly as it was in that Court, and the party has no benefit from being possessor of the decree. But, although it ought not to be reviewed on the merits, the regularity of a foreign judgment is a proper matter to be examined into; and it is probably in this sense that most of the authorities, according to which a foreign decree is held to be examinable, are to be understood: if, for instance, there is any circumstance in reference to the proceedings in the foreign court, which is alleged to render the judgment null, according to the law of the country where it was pronounced, and by reason of which it is said that execution could not there have passed upon it, an enquiry into the formality of the judgment would be competent and proper.

The decree in the present case is perfectly regular, and has all the requisites of a complete foreign decree; the defendant, Montgomerie, having made appearance in the cause voluntarily and deliberately,—the Court of New York being the proper tribunal for trying the question,— and the judgment being final, as no appeal has been taken to the Supreme Court of the United States. The specialties founded on by the Lord Ordinary in the second part of his note as going to impugn the decree are not such as can have that effect. The judgment in question therefore being regular and complete, the general rule as above laid down ought to be applied, without regard to the hypothetical limitations thereof referred to by the Lord Ordinary in the first part of his note, which are not recon-cilable either with the general views of jurists or with the course of decisions. The objection to a foreign decree when founded on by way of action receiving effect, while yet effect is given to it when pleaded by way of defence rests on no solid principle; and the distinction taken by Kames<sup>2</sup> between a decree absolutor and a decree condemnatory is equally baseless. The sentence of a competent court, by which both parties are equally bound, should be equally available to the one party and to the other; and it can scarcely be contended that a judgment should be merely prima facie evidence for a party who endeavours to recover his debt by way of action, but should be conclusive in his favour, if he uses it as a defender by way of set off. According to the whole analogy of the law of Scotland, which so far deviates from the Roman law, there is no such distinction recognised as that which must be contended for by the defender, between the actio et exceptio rei judicatæ.

Argued for the Defender:—

There are no grounds either in the law of Scotland or in international law for the position taken up by the pursuers that a foreign decree, however pleaded, if formal and regular, is not traversable either on fact or law; but the rule as laid down by the House of Lords in 1771, in the case of Sinclair v. Fraser, has been ever since recognized as law, viz. that such decree when pleaded by way of action affords only primâ facie evidence of a debt and is examinable. This is consistent with principle, for admitting the justice and equity of the rule res judicata pro veritate habetur, so long as it is applied to the decrees of one state inter se, it cannot apply to foreign decrees, so as to render it incumbent on the courts in this country in all cases to put in execution what may be essentially unjust or contrary to the standard of natural right adopted by civilized states. This rule is modified by a distinction now of long standing between foreign decrees founded on by way of action, and pleaded by way of exception; no examination of the decree being competent in the latter case.<sup>1</sup> And the grounds on which the distinction is admitted are sound, for when the exceptio rei judicatæ is pleaded, the Court are not asked to exercise any active power, but only not to review the judgment of the foreign court; and in giving effect to the plea, the Court does no more than uphold a decree pronounced in the forum originally chosen by the party who wishes to set it aside. In the case of a foreign res judicata brought to the courts of this country for execution, the decree is reviewable, according to the precedents both in Scotland and England;<sup>2</sup> though, in a question such as the present, the law of England ought not to be of great authority. The exceptions which are admitted to the general rule do not trench upon it, but only go to show that great weight is given to the foreign court having been in all respects forum compe- tens, and that, in certain cases, it is so difficult to examine a foreign decree, that the Court absolutely refuse to allow it. Thus, judgments of the Courts of Admiralty are not examinable, such courts being of co-ordinate jurisdiction throughout the whole of Europe; and an interference with the sentences of the respective Admiralty Courts being a matter entering deeply into the politics of the different states. So also, where courts have a peculiar and appropriate jurisdiction, as in questions

 887. Scottish Bankrupt Acts, and also in the instances referred to in the 1 v. Lord Ordinary's note, the Court, having particular regard to the competency of the forum, would hold the decree as standing on grounds so good, that it is impossible to suppose it could be placed upon better, and therefore ought not to be examined. These exceptions, so far from trenching on the general rule that foreign decrees are examinable, go to destroy the principle contended for by the pursuers. In the present case, the decree founded on comes under none of the exceptions which have been mentioned; but, looking to the circumstances under which it was obtained, and the irregularity and injustice appearing ex facie of the proceedings, it does not afford even prima facie evidence that the debt sued for is due by the defender.

The cause was this day put out for advising.

LORD MEDWYN.—The present question is one of rare occurrence, and proper to be deliberately discussed. By the act 1487, c. 105, the King and Council are declared to be the peculiar court, for the causes of "strangers of uther realmes." The Court of Session succeeded to this jurisdiction, and a particular day of the week was assigned to such causes. Foreign contracts were sustained and enforced when according to the lex loci contractus.<sup>2</sup> So, on the principle of contract, assignment to a trust-deed for creditors abroad was held effectual to preclude arrestments used in this country against the debtor.<sup>3</sup> In like manner, that species of contract by which parties submit a dispute to arbiters is sustained, and their award enforced and given effect to without examination.<sup>4</sup> This is a strong advance towards supporting and giving effect to the decree of a foreign court.

When a foreign judgment is pleaded on in another country in which the opposite party is now resident, it may be of different descriptions; either a decree condemnator, founded on in order to be enforced, or a decree absolutor pleaded in defence, or a decree condemnator already carried into effect. The present falls under the first class. Since a foreign contract or a decree-arbitral is enforced, if regular according to the lex loci, and not inconsistent with morality or religion, it may be thought to follow that the decree of a foreign court should also in every case be enforced, as founded on the quasi contract of litiscontestation. But we find that Kames, Bankton, and Erskine, though on somewhat different grounds, all say that, before a court can be called on to enforce a foreign decree, it is entitled and bound to examine the decree, in case there should be ground in law or equity for refusing to enforce it as unjust on the merits; and this in accordance with the decision in Sinclair v. Fraser, confirming what had been previously found in the cases of Goddard and Edwards.

It is not on the principle of contract, then, that a foreign decree comes to be regarded in the courts of another country. In the case of Chitty, in 1810, which is the last judgment on the point in dispute, Lord Newton found, "that a decree of the Court of Madras was prima facie evidence of the debt libelled on, but that it was competent for the defender to impeach the same upon the head of iniquity." This interlocutor was adhered to by the Second Division of the Court, but, on a reclaiming petition being given in, a hearing was ordered, which never took place, the defender having returned to Madras.

Where a foreign decree is pleaded upon in defence, giving rise to the exceptio rei judicatæ, it is clear law that we ought to give effect to such decree without attempting to review it on the merits. Even here, however, an exception has been admitted, that if, on the face of a judgment absolvitor, it appear to have been given because the proper document was not before the court, but only a copy, such judgment will be no good defence, if the original document is produced and founded on.<sup>1</sup> But where no such objection occurs, it appears, from a series of decisions, commencing with the case of the Dutch East India Company, and concluding with the case of White, in 1820, that such decrees afford the plea of exceptio rei judicatæ, and are not examinable. The interlocutor of the First Division in the last-mentioned case is instructive:—"Find that the final decree-absolvitor and the final and executed decree-condemnator pronounced by the State of South Carolina, which court was a proper court for the trial of the interests of the competing parties, and to which court the pursuer did herself carry her claim of succession, are final and conclusive decrees between the said parties, and that it is not competent for this court to enquire into the grounds or reasons of the said decrees, or to open up the said decrees and try the same question again, between the same parties, in respect of an allegation of iniquity."

I am not disposed to think with the pursuers, that there is no sound principle in the distinction which is thus established between being called to enforce a foreign sentence, and sustaining it in defence, when it is an absolvitor or a decree already put in execution. In the latter case, we are not asked to grant the exentorials of our law to invert the state of possession. Each party remains in the state in which they have been placed by a court having power to adjudicate their rights, to which the pursuer resorted for redress, and which court has not seen cause to give the redress which was asked. But if a court in one country is required to enforce a decree pronounced in another country which ordains the defender to pay or perform, it seems fit that the court which, not ex necessitate but ex comitate only (for it cannot be on the doctrine of contract between the parties), interferes with the view of doing justice, should enquire if what is to be enforced be just, otherwise the court may be enforcing what is unjust; and so the law seems to be fixed, that a foreign decree is not to be enforced if it can be impeached on the ground of irregularity or iniquity.

But the rule as to the exceptio rei judicatæ will not account for every case where a foreign decree is not examinable.

Certain exceptions are admitted; but still I think they do not trench upon the general rule. Such are Admiralty decrees, which, on grounds of international law, are of great authority among commercial states; judgments in cases of pecu-

 1697. founded exception, being to be found in the admitted expediency of having such 1827. questions settled once and for ever in the courts to which the parties were at first 1840. amenable, and also in the obedience which in former times was given to the ecclesiastical courts throughout Christendom in matters within their jurisdiction. None of these exceptions embrace the present case.

In an international question of this kind, it is important to consider how the law stands in other countries. The law laid down by Lord Mansfield in Walkerv. Witter, that “foreign judgments are a ground of action every where, but they are examinable,” and by Chief-Justice Eyre and Justice Buller, as noticed in Phillips (I. p. 349–350), seems to be supported by Lord Brougham in the case of Hemditch, and recognised as the law of England. The American law adopts this view likewise,<sup>1</sup> in so much that it required an act of Congress in 1790 to make the judgments of the different State Courts have faith and credit in the other States, which prior to that they had not. France, in the last revision of her code, has altered a former ordinance, which expressly declared that judgments of foreign courts could not receive execution in France. They may now be executed in France, but they are examinable.<sup>2</sup> It does not appear that greater effect was given to the judgments of the courts of the respective States under a foederal government in Germany and the United Provinces.<sup>3</sup>

But while thus concurring with the Lord Ordinary that this decree is examinable, it seems difficult to say how far and to what extent it is to be so. I do not see that precise rules on this subject have any where been laid down. The Lord Ordinary seems inclined to give much less effect to the judgment in this case than I am disposed to do. (His Lordship then referred to the American proceedings above mentioned.) While I agree, therefore, with the first part of the Lord Ordinary’s interlocutor, I cannot concur in the second finding.

LORD MEADOWBANK.—I have felt the difficulty of this question, and after a consideration of the authorities, have come to the result that neither in England nor Scotland has the general principle been definitively settled. The point was fully argued in the case of the Duchess of Kingston, decided three years after the decision in Sinclair v. White, when the House of Lords, after taking the opinion of the twelve Judges, waived the general question, and decided the case upon specialties. And in Houlditch v. Lord Donegal, we have Lord Brougham declaring that if the case had required to be decided on general grounds, he would have called in the twelve Judges. Looking to the authorities in Scotland, and especially to the Lord President’s opinion in Chitty’s case in 1810, when a hearing on the point was ordered but never took place, the law does not seem to be more settled here.

LORD GLENLEE.—I have much the same opinion as Lord Medwyn. It is plain that the pursuer’s plea that this decree cannot be impeached at all, but must be held pro veritate is not well-founded. As to the other view, that it is to be taken as prima facie evidence and to stand good if no grounds are shewn for opening it up, it will be difficult to fix a general abstract rule for every case, and I shall abstain Southgate v.

 Montgomerie

The first thing to consider is the nature of the pleas. (His Lordship referred to the facts of the case in connection with these pleas.) Upon this, I see as yet no grounds for opening up the decree in this case, though no doubt that a foreign decree may be examined.

JUSTICE-CLERK.—This question appeared to us to be one of international law. In addition to the able cases for the parties, we have had an elaborate argument from the bar. The object I chiefly had in view was to form my opinion on the general question, and on that alone, I am now to state my opinion, but not the merits of the case. I was desirous of knowing whether there had been any change in the recent decisions from what was formerly held to be law in regard to a foreign decree when pleaded in this country to enforce a claim. If it were to be held as fixed that the law laid down in the case of Fraser v. Fraser had been departed from in England, I am free to admit that the House of Lords might be disposed to give great weight to such departure; but I have not been able to discover the evidence of this alleged alteration in the law. In that House of Lords declared "that the judgment of the Supreme Court of Scotland ought to be received as evidence prima facie of the debt, and that it lies on the defendant to impeach the justice thereof;" and the principle so fixed, which is in perfect conformity with the opinion of Lord Mansfield in Walker v. Witter, and which has been held to be law by Kames, Bankton and Erskine. Whether it might not be a more convenient rule to hold that the decree of a foreign Court, a correct extraction of which is produced, should in all cases have effect given to it as res judicata, I shall not say; but no such rule has ever been adopted in Scotland, and there may have been cases leaning that way, yet there is no such series of authorities in favour of this view, to which, as a judge, I am bound to bend. I add, Mr Story, in his valuable work on the conflict of laws, after going through the authorities, and advertent to Lord Kenyon and Lord Ellenborough having indicated a different opinion from that of Lord Mansfield, does say,—“There is much reason to contend that the present inclination of the English courts of common law is in the conclusiveness of such judgments,”<sup>1</sup> but I cannot think the decided authorities establish that any such departure from the former state of the law has yet taken place. The case of Tarlton v. Tarlton<sup>2</sup> in 1815, will be found, when examined by no means to go so far as is supposed. The plaintiff there had been bound, by fear of a sequestration, to pay a certain sum, for which he had held indemnity from co-partners; and when he sued for his relief, the defendant, one of the partners, wished to shew that a decree in Granada, which had fixed a debt on the co-partners, and which that plaintiff had been compelled to pay, was erroneous, the account having been incorrectly taken. But this was not allowed: Lord Ellenborough said,—“I thought I did not sit at nisi prius to try a writ of habeas corpus upon the proceedings in the court abroad. The defendant had not attended to the proceedings, and should have appeared and made his defence. The plaintiff, by this neglect has been obliged to pay the money to avoid a sequestra-

140. tion." And Justice Bailey observes,—“How is this plaintiff to be called upon to unravel these proceedings? as between the parties to the suit the justice of it might be litigated, but as against a stranger it cannot. The defendant was a party to the suit, and by his not appearing has concurred in suffering the plaintiff to be damaged.” Now when the nature of this case and the opinions are considered, it cannot be held as decisive against the doctrine of Lord Mansfield in Walker v. Witter. In the former case in Durnford and East<sup>1</sup> (1791) the rubric is, “The defendant having suffered judgment by default in an action of assumpsit on a foreign judgment, the Court would not refer it to the Master to see what was due, and give the plaintiff leave to order up final judgment for such sum without executing a writ of inquiry.” Mr Justice Buller said,—“Though the debt will lie on a foreign judgment, the defendant may go into the consideration of it.” No doubt, in the late case of Martin v. Nichols, decided by the Vice-Chancellor in 1830, his Honour concludes a very full opinion by saying,—“The old authors and the opinions of Lords Ellenborough and Kenyon, greatly overweigh the proposition to be extracted from the judgment of Lord Mansfield, and the expressions of opinion by Mr Justice Buller. If I were to allow this bill to stand, I should be in effect saying, that the judgment obtained in Antigua may be overruled in the Court of Common Pleas.” But this is a single judgment, and was not reviewed by the Lord Chancellor. It seems to have been brought under the notice of Lord Brougham in the case of Houlditch, where his Lordship thus expresses himself, apparently with reference to it:—“In Martin v. Lucy (which I suppose to be the same case) the Vice Chancellor pronounced a decree which I could not affirm; but that at least shews that it might have been made a ground of proceeding, though it was not conclusive.” Although, therefore, in Houlditch v. Lord Donegal, the decree of the Chancellor of Ireland refusing to entertain or give any effect whatever to the order of the English Court of Chancery was reversed, yet it is manifest that Lord Brougham's opinion on the general question does coincide with those of Lord Mansfield and Mr Justice Buller, and the principle laid down in Sinclair v. Fraser. The recent decisions in our own Courts, which have been referred to, do not appear, as far as we have evidence of them, to contravert this principle. I think it is quite clear no different principle was established in the case of White v. Halyburton; the parties having mutually chosen the American forum, and judgment having been thus obtained and extracted, it fell necessarily to have effect given to it here. I see nothing in the cases of Brown, or Chitty v. Inverarity, that can be viewed as at all deciding this point. In the latter, so far as it went, the Court confirmed the decision in Sinclair's case. Thus I cannot hold that there has been any alteration in the law as formerly settled in accordance with the principle laid down by the Lord Ordinary in the first part of his interlocutor. Whether, while holding that the decrees of the Court of New York cannot be enforced in terms without the defender being heard in objection to it, his Lordship has not allowed too wide a field of examination to be gone into, may be questioned. Till the general principle is fixed, I hold it to be premature to enter on the discussion of the objections to the decree already stated by the defender. I cannot, therefore, agree with the latter part of the Lord Ordinary's judgment, though arriving at the same conclusion with him that the decree is examinable.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Adhere to the inter-locutor of the Lord Ordinary, submitted to review, in so far as his Lordship finds 'that the judgment libelled of the Court of Chancery of the state of New York, being a foreign decree, is not of the same authority as a final decree of the Courts of this country, and can only be considered as affording prima facie evidence of the truth and justice of the claims of the pursuers;' but recal in hoc statu that interlocutor quoad ultra, and remit to his Lordship to hear the defender on his objections to the judgment of the foreign Court, and reserve all questions and claims of either party to expenses of process for his Lordship's determination."

the year 1829, the defenders, Struthers and Son, ordered a quantity of wire-cloth from the pursuers, Wilson and Son, conform to a certain pattern. Struthers refused to pay the price of the wire-cloth when demanded, alleging that it was not according to the pattern. A reference made to arbiters, which came to no result, and thereafter Wilson brought an action before the Sheriff of Lanarkshire for payment of the price of the cloth. The sheriff, before answer, remitted to Mr Andrew Lidbrassfounder, to report whether the wire-cloth was in conformity with the pattern.

and Cockburn.

The pursuers neither represented against the interlocutor ordering the remit, nor attempted to advocate on the mode of proof. The referee proceeded under the remit, and reported specially to the sheriff, that the wire-cloth was not according to the pattern. He was afterwards, at the instance of Wilson, appointed to be examined on the subject of his report at one, if not more, of the meetings for which purpose, both parties were present. Thereafter, Wilson applied to be allowed a proof of his averments as to the article furnished having been conform to the pattern, but the sheriff dismissed the action, with expenses, and the wire-cloth was subsequently sold in the course of a multiplepoinding raised in pursuance of Struthers by Wilson's agent.

Wilson and Son then brought an action against Struthers and Son, to have the sheriff's judgment reduced and set aside, on the ground that they had not been allowed a proof of their averments in the inferior

141. court, and had been improperly held by the sheriff to be foreclosed by the remit to Liddell.

1837.

In defence against the action, it was pleaded:—

1. The judgment of the sheriff is in all respects valid, it having been both competent and regular for him to make the remit to Liddell, and afterwards to take his evidence on oath.

2. Supposing the defenders to have had a right to object to the course pursued by the sheriff, they failed to do so either by representing, or by advocating upon the mode of proof; and, on the contrary, acquiesced in the remit, and homologated it by applying to have Liddell re-examined on the subject of his report, of which re-examination they were prepared to take the benefit.

3. As no objection was made to the remit at the time, and the parties acquiesced in the proceedings under it, it must be taken that both consented to be bound thereby, and it would be contrary both to legal principle and to good faith to allow the defenders to depart from it and enter on proof of facts which were the subject of the remit.<sup>1</sup>

The pursuers answered:—

It is not yet a settled point, though a party in the inferior court should consent to a remit, whether this will bind him, if, on coming into the Court of Session, he should be otherwise advised; in the present case, the pursuers ought not to be bound, as they gave no valid consent, and, in the circumstances of the case, there is no ground to bar them from opening up the sheriff's judgment and resorting to other proof.<sup>2</sup>

The Lord Ordinary (Jeffrey), before answer, "allowed the pursuers to examine Liddell farther as to the import and bearing of his report;" and, particularly, to put to him two questions which the sheriff had refused to allow to be put. The result of this re-examination was likewise unfavourable to the pursuers. Thereafter the Lord Ordinary (Cockburn) repelled the defences, and reduced in terms of the libel, adding the subjoined note.*

* "Assuming that remits, not expressly consented to, but acquiesced in, are as conclusive in an Inferior as in the Supreme Court, still the Lord Ordinary cannot bring himself to hold the report as decisive in the very special circumstances of this case;—for, 1st, The main fact on which remits have been held to have been acquiesced in, has been not merely that they were not objected to, but that they were completely followed out by the party having proceeded before the reporter. But here no such thing took place. The parties differ as to the exact nature of the proceedings; but even from the account given by the defenders themselves, it is plain that there was no fair discussion, after any due notice, before the referee. The notice directed by the sheriff to be

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I had doubts of this interlocutor at first, and they were not been removed. The question is, whether, in regard to small causes which have been dealt with in a certain way in the inferior courts, and where remits have been made, we are to disregard these proceedings? There has been always disposition on the part of this Court to give effect to remits. In the present case, the sheriff has thought that the most expedient course were to make a remit; which, certainly, there is no minute of consent on record, but there is likewise objection. It is clear that the proceedings under the remit were not ex parte. The sheriff received the report, which he caused Liddell to verify on oath. This is a circumstance not in the Monkland Canal case, which was a judgment to be effect, that when a remit has been made by the Court to a man of skill, no need at large as to the subject-matter of the remit will be afterwards allowed. His party then, having allowed the report to be given in and verified, next comes in to get quit of it. The Lord Ordinary suggests certain questions which are to be answered by Liddell, who is satisfied that there has not been a fulfilment of the contract of parties. It is also material to consider the impossibility of recovering the wire-cloth, which has been sold since the proceedings in question. Looking to the whole matter, therefore, I am for altering the interlocutor.

LORD MEDWYN.—This is an important case for the proceedings in inferior courts. Where a remit has been made, it is held that, if a party do not object, he is bound thereby. This party might have advocated as to the mode of proof, but he acquiesced. When he comes into this Court, he acquiesces once more, when he might have reclaimed against the interlocutor allowing additional questions to be put to Liddell. Because the farther examination of Liddell supports the sheriff's judgment, are we to reduce it? I agree with the chair therefore, and I am for altering.

LORDS GLENLEE and MEADOWBANK concurred.

THE COURT accordingly altered, sustained the defences, and absolved with expenses.

given was confessedly not given; and though it be said that one of the pursuers and his agent attended one meeting before the referee, it is not distinctly alleged that that was the occasion on which the merits of the case were discussed, and indeed it is admitted that a more nice examination (being the only factual one) afterwards took place. 2dly, When Mr Liddell was examined, in explanation of his report, the sheriff refused to put two questions to him, which were proposed by the pursuer. By an interlocutor pronounced in this action by Lord Jeffrey, 15th November, 1834, it was found that these questions ought to have been put, and they have been put since the case came into this Court. But it is thus fixed that the sheriff's judgment was pronounced upon evidence on which it ought not to have been rested. Considering these peculiarities, the Lord Ordinary thinks that the general rule about remits is not interfered with by withholding effect from this one, and that the justice of the case requires that it be not taken as decisive. Remits fairly gone into should be abided by, but there is no satisfaction in catching a party in them."

THE estate of George Pentland of Perth was sequestrated in the year 1826; the sequestration was thereafter recalled and a trust-conveyance of the estate granted in favour of the defender Fraser and Charles Campbell Stewart, W.S., for the purpose of realizing the estate and discharging the claims on it. In 1831, a new arrangement was made and a minute of agreement entered into, whereby Fraser and Stewart agreed to transfer the whole trust-management to Messrs Sandeman and Paton as trustees; they, on the other hand, becoming bound to repay to Fraser Stewart whatever advances had been made by them for behoof of Pentland. By this agreement it was stipulated that the claims of these parties amongst each other should be settled and ascertained by Messrs Kinnear and Clephane, advocates, as arbiters; and that all claims and objections should be brought forward by the parties within three months from the date of the agreement, the party failing to do so being held to discharge his claim; and it was farther declared, "that in the event of the submission above mentioned proving abortive by any unforeseen circumstance so that no decree-arbitral shall be pronounced therein, it is agreed, the judgment to be pronounced by a court of law, on the failure of the submission, shall, to all intents and purposes, have the same effect in regulating the rights of the parties as a decree-arbitral." In the event of the submission proceeding and not being allowed to fall, it was declared "that in adjusting the claims betwixt the said James J. Fraser and Charles Campbell Stewart, or either of them, all commission and professional charges connected with the said George Pentland's affairs notwithstanding any docquets or discharges which he may have signed be still held open by the arbiters or oversman to examination and investigation, as if said professional charges and commission had never been docquetted or approved of." On the other hand it was provided that "in the event of no submission being entered into, or the same proving abortive, and the parties proceeding to settle their disputes at law, in that event the said docquets and discharges shall remain in all respects unaffected by this minute." It was also provided that Sandeman and Paton should grant a bond in security for repayment of advances made by Fraser and

 Robertson, who further bound themselves "as cautioners and , subsidarie along with them," and "that they should impled fulfil the whole obligations and conditions incumbent on them he agreement mentioned in the bond." This obligation was under-he day after the submission was finally executed by the parties.
 fter a submission was entered into by Fraser and Stewart, with and consent of Pentland, on the one part, and by Sandeman and on the other part, to the gentlemen above-mentioned, the time which the decree-arbitral was to be pronounced, being limited to and a day. The submission was subscribed by Pentland. The n regulating the rights of the parties as a decree-arbitral." The were by the deed empowered to prorogate. They accepted the sion, and issued an order for claims, which Fraser and Stewart o lodge. At the end of three and six months respectively from e of the submission, these parties obtained prorogations for lodging laims. Thereafter Fraser borrowed the deed of submission, granteceipt therefor to the clerk, but failed, notwithstanding repeated tions, to return it; whereby the submission expired. Fraser deto renew the submission on the ground that Pentland refused to give sent. The ground of Pentland's refusal was subsequently stated by Mr Fraser in a judicial pleading:—"Such is Mr Pentland's sent to the laws of his country, that the prospect of all future questing buried, as it were, in a submission, was too much for his peace and, therefore, to quiet his fears, the trustees were forced to

142. grant a positive obligation, securing to him the full benefit of a lawsuit in every question that might afterwards arise in the affairs of the trust."

Fraser and Stewart then raised an action of count and reckoning against Sandeman and Paton and the attesters of the bond, to have the amount of their claims ascertained, and payment thereof made to them. The credit of the parties to the bond, with the exception of Sir Patrick Walker and Dr Robertson having thereafter failed, and the trust estate having been attached by diligences at the instance of Fraser and Stewart, Sir Patrick brought an action of declarator against these parties, setting forth Pentland's trust-conveyance in their behalf, the minute of agreement in 1831, the bond following thereon, and the subsequent proceedings as to the submission, and alleging, inter alia, that the conditions and stipulations contained in the minute of agreement and the relative bond and cautionary obligation come under by him had not been adhered to, and that by the acts of Fraser and Stewart, his right of relief as against them, and the prior cautioners had been impaired without his consent, and concluding to have it found and declared that the pursuer was only cautioner subsidarie for Sandeman and Paton, and that Fraser and Stewart by their own acts had liberated the pursuer from all liability under the above-mentioned obligation, which was in consequence thereof extinguished.

Fraser pleaded in defence, inter alia, that both parties were equally bound by the stipulations in the minute of agreement to which the cautionary obligation in question bore reference; that the defender redeemed his obligation to submit by signing the submission, and as it was no part of the previous agreement that it should be renewed in case of falling, but was, on the contrary, specially provided, that in such event the defender's claim should be settled by a court of law, he was warranted in having recourse to legal proceedings for that purpose; and that in the whole circumstances of the case the action was unfounded.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor, adding the subjoined note: *—"Finds, I mo, That it was a condition of the agree-

Fraser reclaimed, and contended that the principal ground on which the interlocutor proceeded was that the submission had not been brought to a close, and that its failure was to be attributed to the defender ; but the deed empowered the arbiters to grant prorogations, and supposing the submission to have been retained by the defender, they might have prorogated on a paper apart, which was matter of common practice, and which they never were required by any of the parties to do ; and thus the submission had not fallen by the fault of the defender but by the negligence of all parties ; that Pentland was admitted to have been a party to the abmission, and if it should be said that after it had fallen he was bound to have renewed it, and yet refused to do so, the defender was not called upon, nor was it his duty to take that step.

Walker v.
Fraser.

The pursuer answered, that, looking to the connexion between the minute of agreement, the bond and obligation in question, he was not bound thereby, unless all the provisions in the minute were acted upon: but the settlement of the accounts by arbitration therein contemplated had been rendered abortive by the defender retaining the deed and refusing to return it that the submission might be prorogated in the usual form, and this could not be considered an "unforeseen circumstance" such as to justify a recourse to judicial proceedings—and that the pursuer was liberated from his obligation by reason of the conditions in reference to which it had been undertaken being without his consent extravened.<sup>1</sup>

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I have come to a conclusion in accordance with the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor. Sir Patrick Walker, by the attestation in question, became bound as cautioner for implement of the bond. We have to look then to the obligations laid on the parties by this bond, which bears to have been granted with reference to certain conditions embodied in the previous minute of agreement. Whatever these conditions are the parties are bound by them. (His Lordship then referred to the heads of agreement above narrated). The provision that he claims between Stewart and Fraser, and all docquets or discharges and accounts which had passed between them, should be open to the arbiters for investigation: the submission, but that they were not to be liable to be opened up should no submission be entered into or the same prove abortive and the parties go to law, is an important provision, and contains the very essence of the case. In regard to the event provided for, of the submission coming to an end by an unforeseen circumstance, is Fraser entitled to say that such has been the case? I have come to the conclusion, from the letters and other evidence in process, that impediments are purposely thrown by Fraser in the way of the submission being brought to a satisfactory close. It is clear that Sir Patrick Walker had an interest in the claims being settled in a submission where the discharges and accounts were to be open for investigation. If, then, the proceedings as to the submission have taken place without his knowledge, and so a change of circumstances has been caused in reference to the obligation undertaken by him, it follows that he ought to be relieved from it. I can arrive at no other conclusion than that the expiry of the submission was caused by the intentional act of Fraser, and that he is not entitled to avail himself of the clause which provides for its falling through an unforeseen circumstance.

LORD MEADOWBANK concurred.

LORD GLENLEE.—I am of the same opinion. I cannot help thinking it an extraordinary account which Fraser gives of his ground for not renewing the submission. His keeping up the submission till past the term of its expiry was a Hog.

LORD MEDWYN.—I differ from the rest of the Court. Looking to the whole circumstances of the case, I am of opinion that Fraser, with a view to his own interest, could not proceed in the submission without Pentland. He had a material interest to carry Pentland along with him, and as the latter refused to proceed with the submission, the "unforeseen event" occurred in the fact of his refusal. With the knowledge we have of the way in which submissions are conducted, there seems to be no ground for saying that what here occurred was to be an absolute bar to Fraser bringing his claim in a court of law. I do not dispute that Sir Patrick Walker's interest was affected by the submission having fallen, but I see no evidence of the failure of the submission having been owing to Fraser.

THE COURT adhered, finding additional expenses.

ALEXANDER HOG, Pursuer.—J. Murray.
ROBERT HOG, Defender.—Marshall.

Process—Sheriff Court—Consuetude.—An action of removing, under A. S. December 14, 1756, was raised in the Sheriff Court of Fife; after defences and replies were lodged, the Sheriff, on 3d March, "appointed the defender against the 10th March current to give in a condescendence," &c.: the 10th of March was a Court-day, and, the cause being in the roll, the Sheriff "having heard parties' procurators, in respect the defender has failed to obtemper the order in the preceding interlocutor of 3d March current, held him as confessed, and decreed against him in terms of the libel:" the defender raised a reduction, in respect the decree was pronounced before any default was committed:—Held, after an enquiry into the practice of the Sheriff courts, which was not uniform, that no default was incurred until after the expiry of the 10th day of March, against which the condescendence was ordered; and that the decree must be reduced, although pronounced according to the practice of the Sheriff Court of Fife. 2. The first reason of reduction libelled was that "the decree was disconform to the warrants upon which the same proceeded:" in the record, the tenor of the interlocutor was stated, and the above plea was included in the pleas in law; held, that it was competent so to state them under a libel thus framed, in respect the decree of 10th March referred in gremio to the tenor of the interlocutor of 3d March, as one of its chief warrants, and was disconform to the tenor thereof.

- Feb. 11, 1837. ON 1st December, 1834, Robert Hog, of Little Balgonie, raised a summons of removing, founded on A. S., 14th December, 1756, against Alexander Hog, tenant in Little Balgonie. Defences were lodged, followed by replies, after which the Sheriff, on March 3, 1835, "appointed the defender, against the 10th March current, to give in a condescendence."

dence in terms of the Act of Sederunt." The 10th of March was a Court day, and the cause being in the roll, and the process being returned by Alexander Hog's agent without any condescendence, the Sheriff, on that day, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Having heard parties' procurators, in respect the defender has failed to obtemper the order in the preceding interlocutor, of 3d March current, holds him as confessed; decerns against him in terms of the libel; and finds him liable in expenses."

No. 143.
Feb. 11, 1837
Hog v. Hog.

This decree was extracted, after which Alexander Hog, who had made no attempt to be reponed against it, raised a reduction of it, libelling, as the first reason, "The said decree is disconform to the warrants upon which the same proceeded, and is not subscribed or authenticated." On the record he stated the tenor of the interlocutors of 3d and 10th March, and added a plea in law, that the decree of 10th March "was incompetent and illegal, having been pronounced before the lapse of the time within which the paper in question was ordered to be given in." Other reasons of reduction were stated on the merits of the case.

In support of the first reason of reduction, Alexander Hog pleaded, 1st, That as the decree purported, in gremio, to proceed upon his failure to obtemper the order of 3d March to lodge the condescendence, it was disconform to its warrant, if the tenor of that order showed that no such failure had taken place; and 2d, That there had been no such failure, at the date of the decree, because the condescendence was ordered "against the 10th of March," so that he had the whole of that day allowed to him for lodging his paper, whereas the procurator of Robert Hog had moved the Sheriff for decree by default in the middle of that day, and had obtained such a decree, dated 10th March, which was therefore pronounced before the default could have occurred.

Robert Hog answered, 1st, That the plea respecting the premature date of the decree was not embraced within any of the reasons of reduction contained in the summons; because the first reason, as there set forth, had a technical and limited signification, which did not cover this plea; and 2d, That if it could be competently stated, it was ill-founded, because the word "against," when prefixed to a given day, prescribed a limit antecedent to the commencement of that day; or, at least, it was a term capable of having its meaning so regulated by practice, as to be made perfectly definite to that effect; and, according to the established practice of the Sheriff Court of Fife, an interlocutor ordering a paper to be lodged "against" a given Court day, warranted a decree by default when the case was called in the Court roll of that day, if no paper was lodged. If this practice was erroneous, an Act of Sederunt might be made to regulate it for the future; but the decrees hitherto pronounced be overturned. And in this particular instance, as the pursuer had not applied to be reponed, and as the interlocutor of

143. the Sheriff was pronounced after "having heard parties procurators," so I, 1837. that there had been some oral discussion before him, the pursuer's al-
 Hog. leged reason of reduction was entitled to the less regard.

The Lord Ordinary "repelled the reasons of reduction, assolizied the defender, and decerned; and found the pursuer liable in expenses."*

Alexander Hog reclaimed. The note was first advised on 26th November, 1836.

LORD GILLIES.—I think the plea that the decree by default was prematurely pronounced admits of being quite correctly stated under the first reason of reduction. The decree under reduction sets forth, on the face of it, that it is pronounced "in respect Alexander Hog has failed to obtemper the order in the preceding interlocutor of 3d March current." On looking back in the record to this interlocutor of 3d March, I find the order referred to in the decree, which order appoints the condescendence to be lodged "against the 10th March current." Now as the decree expressly refers to the terms of this interlocutor, as warranting the issue of a judgment by default, I am satisfied that it is competent to look at the tenor of the interlocutor, for the purpose of discovering whether the decree is conform, or disconform, to this material part of the warrants on which it proceeds. It is another question, whether the plea is well founded; but I strongly incline to think it is. This was a decree by default, a penal judgment, and it appears to me to have been given by construing the terms of the order of 3d March, in a manner different from that in which this Court would have construed such an order, and different from that in which it would have been construed by any other Court that I know. I am, therefore, extremely disinclined to listen to the practice of the Sheriff Court of Fife as any reason for our giving to that order an interpretation which appears to be clearly erroneous. If it could be shown that the same practice prevailed in all the Sheriff Courts in Scotland, that would deserve more serious attention.

LORD BALGRAY.—I have always understood that in interpreting such an order as that of the 3d March, the day "against" which the paper was ordered, was one of those upon which the paper might be lodged; and that the whole day must expire before the default had occurred. But I should wish to consider the state of alleged practice a little farther. There might be an opening up of an immense number of decrees of this Sheriff Court, if such a practice as occurred here has long been acted on. I think a minute as to the practice should be allowed.

LORD MACKENZIE.—I think the plea is quite competently introduced into the record, under this summons, and had it not been so, the defender could have had it struck out of the record, a thing which he never attempted to do, just because it is regularly and competently stated there, in reference to the terms of the summons. In regard to the alleged practice of the Sheriff Court of Fife, and also whether it has reference to any express and published regulation of court, I should

* "NOTE.—The point in the pursuer's first plea, if it were correctly raised would not be free from doubt, but it is plainly not within the grounds of action. The rest of the case is clear."

wish to have farther information. I should also wish to know whether it is a practice confined to the county of Fife, or common to the other counties in Scotland. I by no means hold that I must be bound by the practice even if proved: but I wish to see the nature and extent of it before deciding this question, and if any long established or general practice be shown, it would become a case of very great hardship, to say the least, if this decree and an immense number of others, shall now be held liable to be set aside.

The LORD PRESIDENT was not present.

The Court “recalled the interlocutor reclaimed against, and found that the first plea in law is within the grounds of action; and before answer, allowed the defender to lodge a minute, containing a specific statement of the practice of the several sheriff courts of Scotland in pronouncing decree by default when a paper is ordered to be lodged against an appointed day.”

Under this order, the defender's agent addressed a letter to all the sheriff-clerks of Scotland enquiring what was the practice of their courts in regard to such decrees by default. Answers were received from almost all the sheriff-clerks, but, in a considerable number of these, the expressions used were not free from ambiguity. It appeared, however, that, in a good many counties, a similar practice prevailed to that of the county of Fife; and in a good many of them, an opposite practice prevailed, and decree by default was not pronounced until after the expiry of the day against which an order was to be obtempered. It did not appear from these letters that an express written regulation of court existed on the subject in any county but that of Dumfries. A regulation, dated 30th November, 1830, there provided that where a paper was “ordered to be lodged by a particular court day,” it must be lodged “by twelve o'clock of the court day” or the clerk could not receive it. And after that hour, decree by default might be taken. But when an order was pronounced to lodge a paper “by an appointed day,” which was not a court day, no decree by default could be pronounced till after the lapse of the day so appointed.

The Court resumed consideration of the case along with a minute and answers in reference to the practice thus appearing.

LORD GILLIES.—I am afraid that the decree must be reduced. It appears that the practice in the sheriff courts is just the reverse of being uniform, and I think that, in general, this court has too great a tendency to make the law bend to the irregular practices of local courts. It does not appear to me to be suitable to the advanced state of the law to have one practice in one county, as to the interpretation of the same words in an interlocutor, and an opposite practice in the adjoining county; and when that interpretation, which is manifestly erroneous, is brought under our review, I do not see how we can refrain from dealing with it as an unsuitable and erroneous practice requiring to be immediately checked.

49. I do not think that our reducing this decree will have the effect of setting aside as many others, as the defender has alleged; but, even if the consequences were of a serious nature, that must not restrain us from setting aside a procedure which is clearly erroneous, otherwise the very magnitude of an error would be pleaded in its defence, and we should just be told that if the rectification of it would produce bad consequences for a time it must never be rectified. In this way, the greater the error committed, it would be the more improper to correct it. I cannot listen to a doctrine which leads to this result. In this case, a party against whom a penal decree by default has been taken, is before us, asking redress, because there had been no default committed by him at the time when that decree was taken. I am satisfied that according to the just interpretation of the interlocutors of the sheriff, the pursuer's averment is true, and that he had then committed no default. I do not understand how the interlocutors can be otherwise construed. I cannot refrain therefore from holding that the judgment ought to be set aside. It is true that he might have got himself reponed against the decree in a cheaper and speedier manner than this reduction can accomplish; but it was optional to him to take that mode of redress or not, and though he did not seek it, I cannot hold him barred from the remedy of a reduction.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I do not think the question free from difficulty. This party had an easy remedy by applying to be reponed if he had chosen to avail himself of it, and although the circumstance of his not doing so cannot be pleaded so high as to bar his right of seeking his remedy in another way, by this reduction, still I cannot lay the circumstance altogether out of view in looking at the other points in the case. It is a serious matter to set aside a decree which has been pronounced consistently with the practice of a sheriff court, and I am very reluctant to do so. But I rather incline to think that the practice in this instance is so decidedly erroneous that it cannot be supported. And there is not the same practice prevailing throughout all Scotland. The practice is of a partial sort; and I cannot approve of our administering the law, in a question like this, so that there shall be one law and practice in one county, and another law and practice in the adjoining county. On the whole, therefore, I incline to the opinion that the decree must be reduced.

LORD MACKENZIE.—The practice on this subject, though not uniform throughout Scotland, is plainly not limited to the county of Fife, but prevails in many other counties, and is apparently of some standing. I should therefore have the greatest difficulty in pronouncing any judgment which would overturn such a practice, and which consequently would set aside a number of decrees, great beyond calculation, all of them obtained by what was understood at the time by all parties to be the correct and established form of procedure. Suppose that this case had come from a court such as that of Dumfries, where an express written regulation had been framed by the sheriff relative to the procedure in his court, declaring that where a paper was ordered against a certain day, being a court day, the term within which leave was given to lodge the paper should come to an end at twelve o'clock on that day, and decree by default might immediately afterwards follow. If such a regulation were published for the government of practitioners, and if it were acted on for a series of years, I am not prepared to say that I see any good ground in law for setting aside a decree by default which should be pronounced after twelve o'clock on the day specified. But the present case is nearly identical with that supposed. Because, although no express regulation was drawn up on the subject, yet the established practice of the court, as known to all the procurators, and acted on by them, was precisely what would have been expressed in such a regulation. But being as publicly known by them all, they knew the effect and import of the order on 3d March to lodge a paper against the 10th, just as fully as if there had been such a regulation as I have supposed, and the words of that order seem entitled to the same construction in this case as in the other. In these circumstances, I think the true import of the terms of that interlocutor is competently and effectually explained by the practice of the Court, especially as the word "against" does not in itself seem necessarily, or perhaps even naturally, to be repugnant to such a practice. It rather appears to me that when a paper is ordered "against" a day, it naturally means against the arrival or approach of the day, rather than against the arrival of the day after it. I am afraid that if we hold the decree under reduction to be a nullity, on this reason of reduction, our judgment will have the effect of overturning an immense extent of procedure in many counties in Scotland, and will lay the foundation of numberless actions of damages. I do not, in all the circumstances, feel myself warranted to set aside the decree.

 Respondent.—M'Neill.

Entail—Confusio—Right in Security.—1. A deed of entail reserved power to the heir in possession to grant bonds of provision in favour of younger children; a bond was granted under this power, together with a disposition of a corresponding annual rent out of the estate, and also a disposition of the lands themselves in security; the younger children made their right real by infeftment; the bond and security was afterwards acquired by the next heir in possession, who borrowed money on it, and disposed it in security; the disponee took infeftment under this conveyance; the heir's embarrassments subsequently led to the sequestration of the rents of his estates and the appointment of a judicial factor: Held, that, both in regard to the principal sum, and in regard to the interest, no confusio had taken place, and that the creditor holding the right in security was entitled to a preference on the rents of the estate for the annual interest of the sum lent, in competition with the creditors of the heir in possession. 2. Terms of a clause in an entail, relative to the obligation of the heir in possession to keep down the annual interest accruing on bonds of provision, which held not to affect the exclusion of the principle of confusio.

THE late Dr Davidson possessed the estate of Muirhouse under an entail which allowed the heir to grant bonds of provision in favour of his children, but which were "only to be granted with the special

144. quality, that the same shall never be created to burden the said estate farther than as a security for the sum to which the three years' free rent shall amount, and that the interest and expenses may affect the person of the heirs of tailzie, and the current rents of the tailzied estate, or the separate estates, but shall noways really affect the said tailzied estate, and that the said heirs of tailzie shall be bound and obliged to satisfy regularly pay, and keep down the annualrents of the provisions of the younger children, and thereby disburden the tailzied estate thereof, and not suffer any diligence to pass against the same for arrears, wherein if they fail, the right of the contravener shall, ipso facto, become void and null."

Dr Davidson, in terms of the powers contained in the entail, granted a bond of provision for £8000 in favour of his younger children, together with a disposition of an annualrent of £300 out of the entailed estate, during the non-payment of the bond, and a disposition of the lands themselves in security. The children were infeft under this bond and disposition. After the death of Dr Davidson, the other children and William Davidson, the heir now in possession, with consent of the trustees of the late Dr Davidson, conveyed the bond, to the extent of £4000, to Miss Mary Davidson, one of the younger children, and thereby disposed in her favour an annualrent of £200, being part of the foresaid annualrent of £300, during the non-payment of the principal sum, and they also disposed to her the lands in security. She died in December 1831, without taking infeftment under the precept in the disposition in her favour. She left a general mortis causa disposition in favour of William Davidson, the heir in possession, and he also expedited a service to her as heir of line and provision, in general, in January, 1832. In that year he borrowed £2500, from Misses Elizabeth, Ann, and Grace Welsh, and disposed to them a corresponding annualrent of £125 out of the entailed estate, being part of the said annualrent of £200, and also the entailed lands themselves in security of the principal sum of £2500 besides assigning to them the bond for £4000, for their farther security. In the same year Misses Welsh were infeft under the unexecuted precept in favour of Miss Mary Davidson, which was conveyed by this disposition to them. In 1833 William Davidson granted a charter of confirmation of the bond of provision, and all the subsequent conveyance of it, and infeftments, including that of Misses Welsh. They continued to receive annually, out of the rents of the estate, a sum equal to the stipulated interest on £2500 until Martinmas 1836. In July, 1836, owing to the embarrassed situation of the affairs of William Davidson the rents of the estate of Muirhouse, &c. had been sequestrated by the Court, and Charles Murray Barstow, accountant, was appointed judicial factor. Misses Welsh applied to him for payment of the interest due at Martinmas on their debt, as being preferable on the rents of the estate and as he declined paying without judicial authority, they presented petition, praying for a warrant and order that he should make payment of the past interest, and of future interests as they should fall due, until payment was made of the principal sum. Barstow stated in answer, that William Davidson was the party primarily liable in payment of the annual interest due under this bond, as originally granted by Dr Davidson; and as he subsequently acquired right to the bond, the principle of confusio must take effect, at least during his lifetime, so as to render it impossible for him by any subsequent conveyance of the bond to separate his liability for the interest, qua debtor, from his right to it qua disponent of the original creditor, whilst he lived. And he contended that the clause in the entail already quoted, which specially imposed on the heir in possession a personal liability for the interest, added force to this plea. The petitioners answered, that, according to many decisions,<sup>1</sup> where an heir in possession acquired right to a debt affecting the estate, such debt was held not to be extinguished confusione, wherever the circumstances did not show that he had acquired the right with the purpose and intention of extinguishing the debt; that all such intention was excluded in this case; and that William Davidson, in acquiring right to the debt, was entitled to use it as a fund of credit to himself by borrowing on the faith of it and disposing it in security. And that the clause in the entail was immaterial to this question, as the heir in possession was bound in all cases, and independently of any such clause, to keep down the annual interest of debts affecting the estate.

THE COURT unanimously granted warrant as prayed for, and allowed the petitioners their expenses.

Jury Trial—Proof—Process.—1. A merchant made advances on a shipment of coffee to the owners of the coffee, and some years afterwards, alleging that the coffee had been sold at Malta, and that the proceeds did not reimburse him for his advances, he raised an action for the balance against the owners; the owners alleging that he was consignee and commission-agent in regard to the coffee, and had failed in his duty as such, raised an action against him for the difference between the amount of his advances and the value of the coffee as shipped; no interlocutor was pronounced conjoining the actions, and a separate issue was taken in each, whether the defender in each action respectively, was liable as alleged by agreement of parties, and with the sanction of the Court, the two cases were tried as one cause, before the same Jury, the pleadings of counsel being conducted, and the evidence being adduced, in reference to this arrangement: the merchant, in leading his evidence, tendered a document purporting to be dated at "Malta, 22d August, 1826," and to be an account of sales and charges and nett proceeds of coffee, sold on his account; this document bore at the end of it, the signature of a third party, confessedly genuine, but which third party, residing abroad, had refused to be examined, under a commission sent out for that purpose; the owners objected to the admissibility of the document, but the presiding Judge admitted it, and directed the Jury to rely on it as evidence of the sales therein set forth: the Jury returned a verdict, in each action, finding for the merchant and against the owners, who presented a bill of exception—Held, 1. That the document was inadmissible, in respect, inter alia, that it was not proved to relate to the coffee in question; that it was not proved who the third party was who signed it, or how he was connected with the transaction; and that it was not proved how, when, or where the particulars of the document were filled up; 2. That, as the reception of the document was important in reference to both verdicts; and also, as the two actions had been blended by the form of trial; both verdicts must be set aside.—Observed, that, if the presiding Judge, during the progress of the trial, allows an inadmissible document to be received and read in the meantime, reserving its effect when he should come to charge the Jury, it is very doubtful whether a subsequent charge, directing the Jury to discard it absolutely from their minds, would have the effect of saving the trial from being vitiated by its having once been laid before the Jury.

b. 11, 1837. IN the year 1823, James and Andrew Muir, merchants in Greenock, made two shipments of coffee from the Clyde, upon the security of which shipments, John Muir, merchant in Glasgow, made advances. John Muir was a partner of Samuel Muir and Co. at Malta, where the coffee was sold, and as he alleged that the proceeds, after paying expenses, left him still in advance, to the extent of £1130, 3s. 9d., he raised an action against James and Andrew Muir to recover payment of that amount. They, on the other hand, alleged that John Muir, and Samuel Muir and Co. were the consignees of the coffee, as commission-agents, and had wrongfully failed in their duty as such, and that they remained liable for £1890, 5s., being the difference between the advances made by John Muir, and the actual value of the coffee as consigned. Both actions were sent to the Jury Roll, and the following issues were framed in each of them respectively. (1) In the action at the instance of John Muir: "It being admitted, that, in the month of September, 1823, the defenders shipped from the Clyde 311 bags of coffee, and 298 bags of coffee in the month of November, 1823: It being also admitted that the pursuer, John Muir, advanced certain sums of money to the defender on the said shipments: Whether the defenders are indebted, and resting owing to the pursuer in the sum of £1130, 3s. 9d. sterling, or any part thereof, with interest thereon from the 1st day of January, 1827, as the balance of the said advances." And (2) In the action at the instance of James and Andrew Muir: "It being admitted that, in the month of September, 1823, the pursuers shipped from the Clyde 311 bags of coffee, and 298 bags of coffee in the month of November, 1823: Whether the said coffee, or any part thereof, was consigned to the defenders, or either of them, as commission-agents at Malta, and whether the defenders, or either of them, wrongfully failed in their duty as commission-agents aforesaid, and are indebted and resting owing to the pursuers in the sum of £1390, 5s. sterling, or any part thereof, as the balance of the price or value of the said coffee?"

Both actions came on for trial on the same day, and, by the agreement of parties, with the sanction of the Court, the two cases were tried as one cause, before the same Jury; and the pleadings of counsel, and the evidence adduced, were regulated accordingly.

At the trial, there was tendered in the action at the instance of John Muir, a paper entitled "account-sales, charges on, and nett proceeds of 578 bags coffee, sold on account-current of Messrs S. Muir and Co., Malta." This document purported to state the sales of various parcels of coffee, amounting in all to 578 bags, at different times, in March and April, 1826, partly by auction, and partly by private bargain. It also purported to state the charges and commission thereon, and to exhibit the nett proceeds realized. It bore the date of "Malta, 22d August, 1826," and had a name subscribed to it, which was "Chas. Shaw." It was admitted by James and Andrew Muir that this was a genuine signature; but they objected to the document itself "as not legal or competent matter to be given in evidence by the said John Muir, in proof of the alleged sales and proceeds of the said coffee: But the said Lord Fullerton (presiding Judge) did then and there declare his opinion, that the said account-sales, so proposed and tendered in evidence for the purpose aforesaid, should, in the mean time, be received and read, reserving, when he came to charge the Jury, the effect thereof, or whether the same should be taken into consideration by the said Jury, as evidence of the sales and proceeds of the said coffee: And, thereafter, on charging the Jury, the said Lord Fullerton stated to the Jury, and gave his point of law, that the said account-sales was a document

In the issue in which John Muir was pursuer, the Jury found a verdict for the pursuer; in the other issue, they found for the defenders, John Muir, and Samuel Muir and Co. James and Andrew Muir then presented a bill of exceptions, in support of which they pleaded—

1. The document in question was equally important in reference to the issue in each of the actions, and, if inadmissible, both of the verdicts must be set aside. In the action at the instance of John Muir, the account-sales was essential to prove whether any and what balance was due to him; in the action at the instance of James and Andrew Muir, alleging wrongful failure in duty by John Muir, and Samuel Muir and Co., as commission-agents, it was equally essential in regard to the defence set up by them. But, independently of this, though the two causes had not been conjoined by any interlocutor, they had been practically conjoined by the agreement to treat them as one cause before the Jury, and by arranging as to the pleadings of counsel, and leading of evidence on that footing. If the document, therefore, was improperly admitted, in reference to either action, both verdicts must be set aside, and this was imperative by the words of the statute.<sup>1</sup>

2. It was not competent to refer to any matter, not within the bill of exceptions, in aid of the document objected to; and every allegation, which went beyond the bill, was denied. Looking, then, to the bill of exceptions alone, the document in question, even if it proved its own contents, was not instructed to relate at all to the coffee of James and Andrew Muir, more than to any other coffee. Neither did it appear what Charles Shaw was who signed it, except that he resided at Malta, and had refused to be examined as a witness in this cause under a commission which had been sent out to Malta for examining witnesses; and that John Muir had offered him no discharge of any liability which he might have incurred in respect of the sales, so that he had an interest in supporting the propriety of them.

3. But the document was not probative of its contents. For any thing that appeared in proof, it might have been signed as a blank sheet at Malta, and the whole of what was written above the signature, might have been added after it came here. It did not even possess the degree authenticity belonging to regularly kept books, being merely a loose sheet, and it did not appear in what manner it had been made up. No part of it was supported on oath, and it did not establish the fact that any sale had taken place,<sup>1</sup> nor, of course, the date of the sale, the price received, or the other particulars stated. And as Charles Shaw who signed, had refused to be examined, that only increased the objection to its admissibility; and as John Muir, and Samuel Muir and Co. did not offer to discharge him of ultimate liability for his conduct in regard to these sales, they had not done all in their power to adduce the best evidence which could be had, and were therefore debarred from resorting to secondary evidence. And, generally, whatever effect might be due to such a document in any question between Shaw, and John Muir, or Samuel Muir and Co., it could be of no avail against a third party.

Pleaded by John Muir—

1. The two actions had never been conjoined, and, as a separate issue was tried, appropriate to each, and a separate verdict returned on each issue, the reception of an inadmissible document, even if it did take place, could not strike against both verdicts, if it could be shown that the bearing of that document related only to one action. And the account-sales was of no consequence, excepting in the action at the instance of John Muir. In the action by James and Andrew Muir, a sum was claimed, which did not depend on the amount of proceeds stated in the account-sales, but on the difference between John Muir's advances, and the value or invoice price of the coffee as consigned; all which facts were established aliunde. This document, therefore, did not affect the issue in J. and A. Muir's action, and the verdict in it could not be disturbed, whatever might be the fate of this bill of exceptions. And there was no injunction in any of the statutes regulating Jury Trial, which could affect this limitation of the effect of the exception in such a case as this.

2. Though not recited in the bill of exceptions, it was competent to refer to the summons of James and Andrew Muir, which narrated that in January, 1827, they had been furnished with the account-sales in question, as the account-sales of their coffee. And it was also competent to refer generally to the record as instructing that parties were agreed on both sides that the coffee had been sold in 1826, and that no objection had been stated against the authenticity of the account-sales rendered, up to the date of the Jury Trial. It was therefore sufficiently instructed that the account-sales related to the coffee in question; and that Shaw, the party who signed it, and whose signature was admitted, was the party who sold the coffee.

3. Shaw had refused to be examined on oath, though a commission had been sent out to take his evidence; but all the evidence was tendered, of

145. which the case admitted. The account-sales was conceived in the ordinary terms, and authenticated in the common form, in which such documents pass among mercantile men. In mercantile practice such documents are constantly acted on, as of undoubted authenticity, and unless it was to be received as making faith in judgment, the result would be to throw commercial dealings loose, to a dangerous extent.

LORD GILLIES.—I entertained great doubt, from the first, respecting the direction by the Judge who presided at the trial, and I now feel satisfied that nothing has been stated which is adequate to remove that doubt. On the contrary, it has become stronger in my mind, as the discussion has proceeded, and I am reluctantly convinced that the verdicts must be set aside, and a new trial granted. One great object of Jury trial is to obtain the judgment and decision of a Jury upon the evidence. But it is the province of the presiding Judge at the trial, to separate that which is evidence from that which is not evidence, when tendered by either of the parties, and to take care that nothing but that which is competent evidence is laid before the Jury. The Judge must determine what is legal and admissible evidence, and exclude every thing else; and then it rests with the Jury to say what weight is due to the evidence so laid before them. In regard to the exclusion of all incompetent documentary evidence, I am not surprised that some difficulty was felt here, when Civil Jury Trial was first introduced. For it had been the practice in the Court of Session to lay every sort of document before the Judges, relying that they, who knew the laws of evidence, would separate those documents which were admissible, from those which were not admissible, and would absolutely discard the latter from their minds, even if they had been obliged to read the documents first, in order to ascertain whether they were admissible or not. But whether this was a safe course or not, in respect to the Judges of this Court, it is a totally different thing to extend such a practice to a Jury. And I feel the greatest doubt as to that part of the proceeding of the presiding Judge, when he directed a document in "the mean time to be received and read, reserving, when he came to charge the Jury the effect thereof, or whether the same should be taken into consideration by the said Jury, as evidence of the sales and proceeds of the said coffee." If, at the end of the trial, his Lordship had been of opinion that the document was inadmissible, he would undoubtedly have charged the Jury to that effect, and have told them to discard it utterly from their minds; but supposing the Jury to have earnestly endeavoured to do so, it does not follow that they could, by any mental effort whatever, efface the impression which had previously been made, or produce within their minds that same view of the case in all its complex bearings and details, which would have been produced if the document had never been at all submitted to their consideration. But although I have thought it right to notice this, as an important subject involved in the proceedings under our review, the question does not turn upon it, as the presiding Judge did not finally direct the Jury to discard the document from their minds, but to receive it as legal evidence of the sales therein set forth, and generally, in terms of the charge as given in the bill of exceptions. And we must now decide whether his Lordship's direction was well-founded.

Upon this point I have formed a decided opinion. The document was not admissible in evidence, as tendered. There is nothing extrinsic of the document to p in any shape whatever; and, taken per se, it was not admissible. It No. 145.

 at the signature of the name of Charles Shaw is admitted to be genuine :
 ng more than this is admitted; and nothing more than this proved. It is F.b. 11, 183 in proof before us that he was the party authorised to sell the coffee of Muir v. Muir d Andrew Muir. It is not in proof before us what was his duty or bu-what was his character, in reference to this transaction. Historically we v something of these particulars in consequence of the explanation which laid before us in defending the direction of the presiding Judge: but the not before us in such a shape that we can rest on them judicially in deon the merits of this bill of exceptions. And it is my opinion that the tendered was not admissible evidence, but should have been rejected.
 d, however, that the erroneous reception of this document can affect only t on ope of the issues, being the issue in the action at the instance of r, and that it cannot affect the verdict on the issue in the action at the f James and Andrew Muir. It does not appear to me that this limitade out. The document was tendered in proof of the sales of the coffee.
 to be proved by it were essential not merely to the action at the instance Muir, for the balance between his super-advances, and the actual proceeds sales; but also, in the action by James and Andrew Muir, which, under of the advances, concluded for the value of the coffee as shipped, in re-reach of duty by the alleged consignees and commission-agents. Now, has been pleaded that the amount of proceeds arising at the sales, could the value of the coffee as shipped, nor the amount of the advances made, quently the amount concluded for in that action; still, the time of the amount realized, and generally the particulars of the sales, entered essenthe question whether the conduct of the alleged consignees and commis-s had been such as to amount to breach of duty, and upon that question claim of James and Andrew Muir hinged. I cannot, therefore, adopt hat this document was of importance only as to one of the verdicts, and olutely no weight at all in respect to the other. I take a very different s importance; and I am confirmed in the opinion that the reception of ent must set aside both verdicts alike, when I consider the form in which tions were tried. The whole evidence was regarded as so completely o the merits of both cases, that they were practically conjoined by being e the same Jury, to be tried at once, under an agreement which was l by the Court, and by which both the evidence adduced, and the pleadunsel were regulated. Accordingly the bill of exceptions now tendered both causes alike; it sets forth their being tried together in the blended mentioned, and then proceeds to state, that "upon the trial of the said counsel learned in the law for the said John Muir, to maintain their r the said issue, did tender" the document in question; again the bill that the opposite counsel "did object to the admissibility of the said itled account-sales, as not legal or competent matter to be given in evi-the said John Muir, in proof of the alleged sales and proceeds of the said ut the presiding Judge allowed it to be received in the mean time, and i charged the Jury that they might rely on the document "as evidence les therein set forth." As there was but one trial and one Jury, before document was laid as proof of the sales in question; and as I hold that

145. it was not legal evidence to that effect, I consider that the result must now be set aside the verdict in both actions.

Muir. LORD MACKENZIE.—I concur. There are two questions here; first, as to the validity of the exception; and second, as to the effect which it is to produce upon one or both of the verdicts. In regard to the first question, it appears from the bill of exceptions that the presiding judge at the trial "stated to the jury, and gave his direction in point of law, that the said account-sales was a document which the jury were entitled to take into consideration, and to rely on as evidence of the sales therein set forth, and then and there allowed the same to be, and the same was accordingly given in evidence in that behalf." In regard to the account-sales, nothing is before us in support of it, excepting the admission that the name "Charles Shaw" occurring at the end, is a genuine signature, and that the document appears to be of the same tenor with the account-sales which was sent to John Muir. But we know nothing of the character or duty of Shaw, in connection with this transaction. We do not even know that he wrote the contents of the paper at which his signature now appears. There is nothing else which proves the sales as there stated; on the contrary, Shaw refused to take an oath in support of the account-sales. In these circumstances I cannot but hold that this document was not more producible at the trial than any other paper whatever, which a party might have thought fit to tender. The exception against its admissibility must therefore be sustained.

The next enquiry is, whether this strikes at both verdicts, or at one only. On this subject it has been pleaded by James and Andrew Muir, that under the statutory enactments relative to bills of exception, it is imperative on the Court to order a new trial in both of these actions if we hold that there must be a new trial in either of them. The terms of the statute are certainly very general, but I am not prepared to adopt this construction of them, that in all cases in which two actions have been tried at the same time before one jury, or even in every action where separate issues have been tried, that, if a bill of exceptions be sustained as to any part of the procedure at the trial, the whole must fall together. It may be that there is so complete a separation and distinction between the issues, that the one is independent of the other. They may be absolutely distinct; and if so, it may happen that an exception shall be good against the verdict on one issue, which shall not be good against the verdict on any other. Suppose, for example, that the ground of exception was the erroneous interpretation of the terms of one issue only, and that this erroneous interpretation had clearly no bearing upon the trial of the other issues. Although such exception should be sustained so far as concerned the issue which had been erroneously interpreted, it would be the greatest hardship and injustice to allow it to have the effect of setting aside the verdict on any other issues; and indeed it would seem as unreasonable as to say that if a leak sprung in one ship of a fleet, it must not only have the effect of sinking that one ship, but of drawing all the rest of the fleet after her to the bottom. But although I have been led to advert to this subject, in consequence of the manner in which this cause has been argued, it is a point which does not require to be decided, and I reserve my definitive opinion till then. In this case, the document tendered and received is of manifest importance, I conceive, in both the one action and the other; but it would have been enough merely to say, that it is not demonstrated by John Muir to have had no bearing or effect on the verdict returned in the action at the instance of James and Andrew Muir. The whole details of the sales of the coffee were evidently of importance in both actions; both were tried at once by the jury; and the erroneous reception of the document purporting to instruct the sales, with the relative charge by the presiding judge, appears necessarily to lead to the result of setting aside both the one verdict and the other.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I concur in thinking that both verdicts must be set aside. The document purporting to be an account-sales, does not even bear in gremio any attestation that it was made up from the books of Shaw, the party who signs it. There is no evidence that that document, as it now stands, was prepared by him. Nor is there any evidence to prove who he was. I think, therefore, the exception must be sustained, and a new trial, in both actions, granted.—And I may add in reference to the clause in the statute referred to by Lord Mackenzie, that I fear its terms are more absolute and binding than his Lordship is disposed to consider them. But it is unnecessary to decide just now on their import.

LORD GILLIES.—It is not necessary now to decide on them, and I have refrained from offering any opinion respecting them.

THE COURT then sustained the exception; set aside both verdicts; and granted a new trial in both actions. Their Lordships also awarded to James and Andrew Muir their expenses since the date of the trial.

ANDREW LOCKIE and OTHERS, Petitioners.—R. Bell.

JOHN MASON and OTHERS, Respondents.—G. G. Bell—Pyper.

Bankrupt—Trust.—Circumstances in which the Court granted a petition for sequestration of a bankrupt, though opposed by the trustees under a private trust-deed for the whole creditors, who were vested both in the heritage and moveables of the bankrupt, and had effected partial sales of the moveables:—in respect, inter alia, (1.) that the creditors who acceded, had done so, under the condition of the bankrupt giving such explanation of his affairs as they should deem satisfactory, and that the petitioning creditors were not satisfied with the explanations given: (2.) that all the creditors had not acceded: and (3.) that, under the private trust, a great deal of litigation was about to ensue respecting alleged preferences by the bankrupt.

ANDREW LOCKIE, JOHN GRAY, and PETER KER, were creditors of John Mason, distiller in Kelso, who became insolvent. He executed a trust-disposition in favour of John Waldie and two others as trustees for behoof of his creditors. Within a few days after this, Mason was rendered bankrupt. Lockie, Gray, and Ker acceded to the trust-deed, but under condition that Mason “made such a statement of his affairs as the creditors

On being examined as to his affairs, Mason made an explanation which some of the creditors, including Lockie and others, did not deem satisfactory, and they applied to the sheriff for a warrant to have Mason and all concerned examined on oath. This application was refused as incompetent. In the mean time the trustees, under the trust-disposition, had taken infestment in Mason's heritage, and possession of his moveable effects, and had sold part of the moveables under the trust. Lockie, Gray, and Ker then petitioned for sequestration as being the most effectual means of obtaining a thorough examination into the state of the bankrupt's affairs, and of cutting down all preferences. They pleaded that there was no bar to their application as their accession to the trust-deed was expressly conditional on their being satisfied with Mason's explanation as to his affairs, which however had proved unsatisfactory; and farther because it was an implied condition, in every case of accession, that all the creditors should concur, or none should be bound, and all the creditors had not concurred here. Mason, and the trustees under the voluntary trust, lodged answers, pleading that by § 15, of the Bankrupt Act, if they could show reasonable cause why the sequestration should not be awarded, the Court must refuse it; that the petitioners had acceded to the trust-deed, and, as there had been an actual conveyance by the bankrupt of his heritable and moveable effects vesting them in the trustees, which was followed by partial sales under the trust, there was jus quæsitum, both to the bankrupt and the general creditors, to resist any application by the petitioners, which would have the effect of overturning the trust.<sup>1</sup> They also stated that the trustees were about to institute reductions of preferences; and, they alleged that the greater part of the creditors were satisfied with the explanations given by Mason as to his affairs, and contended that the petitioners must show reasonable grounds for dissatisfaction if they meant to found on it.

Parties were at issue whether two out of the three private trustees, had not themselves received preferences; and whether the facts on which this allegation rested, had been discovered after, or before, the deed of accession.

LORD GILLIES.—I am afraid that, in the circumstances of this case, we cannot refuse the petition for sequestration. Private trust-deeds are often convenient, and highly useful; but they are also often frustrated. Such a deed, I conceive, requires the accession of all the creditors, in order to make it permanently binding upon any of them. If, however, it could truly be alleged that these petitioners had unconditionally acceded, and that their present petition was in violation of their agreement to accede, it would have required a very strong case to justify such an applica-

But they acceded only under the express condition that the bankrupt give such explanation of his affairs as the creditors should consider proper and satisfactory. That being the case, it is for the creditors to say whether they are satisfied with the explanations to be so; it is not for us to decide that. If any of the creditors, who acceded under that condition, are not satisfied, they are just as free to say they had not acceded at all. Now it is clear that some of the creditors did think the explanations satisfactory, and even applied to the sheriff for a warrant of sequestration of the bankrupt which was refused, as he had no power to grant it in the precise case therefore occurred, in which the creditors had reserved right to accede without regard to the trust-deed if they chose; and, without entering into other facts of the case, I think the petition for sequestration must be granted, unless reasonable cause to the contrary is shown.

MACKENZIE.—I am of the same opinion. The accession to the trust-deed did not include all the creditors; and it would be a very hard thing, as to any creditor, to hold that he was bound up by his accession, while other creditors, by not acceding, were left free to follow what diligence they chose. I do not think that any acceding creditor can be so bound. I hold it is an implied condition in every deed of accession, that all the creditors of the bankrupt shall accede, and are to remain bound. But besides this, the accession in this case contained an express condition, that the bankrupt should give such explanation of his affairs as the creditors should deem proper and satisfactory. The petitioners are creditors who think his explanation unsatisfactory; and it is for them to judge as to that. In view of these decisive circumstances, it appears that the purposes of the private trust cannot be extricated but by several reductions, which the private trustees are to bring, and which may probably lead to a multiplicity of proceedings, and a mass of litigation. I do not consider that, in all the circumstances, it would be safe or just for the Court to refuse the petition for sequestration.

PRESIDENT.—I am of the same opinion. Even if there had been an unconditional accession, the petitioners might not have continued bound in the event of a supervening change of circumstances. And, on the facts of this case, I think there is nothing to bar the application for sequestration.

THE COURT granted sequestration as craved.

GEORGE GORDON, Senior, and GEORGE GORDON, Junior, Advocators. No. 147.

—D. F. Hope—Forsyth.

MR JAMES GRANT SUTTIE, Respondent.—Keay—Whigham.

—1. A lease of a pottery, and certain premises including a park or enclosure, was granted, for twenty-one years, "with the privilege to the tenant of digging and sagger clay within the said park or enclosure, for the purpose of the pottery:"—held that the tenant had no right to use the clay for making bricks, excepting so far as required for the use of the pottery.—2. Circumstances in which the tenant of a pottery had unwarrantably manufactured a quantity of bricks, and, on caution for the value of the bricks, had been found liable to his landlord in the value of the bricks were manufactured.

147. In 1812, George Gordon, sen., and the late Robert Gordon, potter, took a lease, from the late Countess of Hyndford, of a pottery, "as all and whole the park or inclosure at Morrison's Haven, &c., with the privilege to the said Robert and George Gordon of digging clay and sagger clay within the said park or enclosure, for the purpose of the foresaid pottery." The lease was to run for twenty-one years after Martinmas 1811. During the course of the lease, Gordons occasionally made bricks at the pottery, chiefly for the use of the work. In the autumn preceding Martinmas 1833, when the lease was to expire, they manufactured 32,15 bricks. Sir George Grant Suttie of Preston Grange, who had succeeded to the property under lease, presented a petition to the Sheriff of Haddingtonshire, setting forth that Gordons had no right to apply the clay which they dug under their lease, to the purpose of brick-making, at least if the bricks were made for sale, or for being carried off the ground and applied to purposes unconnected with the pottery, in respect the brick-making was no branch of a potter's manufacture, and it was only for the use of the pottery that the privilege of digging clay had been granted; and that there was a large quantity of bricks, thus unwarrantably manufactured, now lying at the works, and which Gordons intended to carry off. He prayed the sheriff "to find that the clay digged or to be digged by them from the foresaid enclosure, in virtue of the lease, may be applied by them for the purpose of the pottery, and for no other purpose, and that they have no right to apply such clay in the making of bricks for sale, or of being carried off the ground, and applied to purposes unconnected with the pottery; and to find them liable in damages and expenses."

Gordons in their answer contended, that they might lawfully manufacture the clay into bricks for sale, especially as the pottery was a brown ware pottery, and that they had always been in the practice of doing so but, separately, that the operations in every pottery occasioned a constant consumption of bricks, which were used in the kilns, and that it was the practice at all potteries where suitable clay could be found, to make such bricks as were required for the pottery, and that they (Gordons) had only acted according to the true powers contained in their lease, in reference to the understanding and practice of the trade, in manufacturing their bricks. In any event, they pleaded that, if Sir George was entitled to retain the bricks on the ground, he must pay their value, or at least the cost of the manufacture, including the duty paid to Government.

During the discussion the bricks were valued, under a judicial remit at £45, 16s. 5d., and Gordons were allowed to remove them on caution for that value. They carried them off and used them in the construction of a rival pottery in the neighbourhood.

The sheriff allowed a proof, from which it appeared that, after applying the clay to the manufacture of potter-ware, there was a clay left, which could not, without disproportionate expense, be making pottery ware, but which were useful for making into that bricks were constantly needed at a pottery, as there was a or less waste at the kilns, on every occasion of their being fired ; kiln wholly gave way, it might require 40,000 bricks to replace that this accident might occur unexpectedly at any time. Such witnesses as were potters also swore that they would have considered bricks, so far as not used in the pottery at the end of the lease, their own property as much as any other articles manufactured by their trade. It farther appeared from the proof that Gordons a very long period, been in the practice of manufacturing bricks works, but chiefly for the use of the pottery. It did not appear what extent this manufacture had been carried on ; nor that a manufacture of bricks for sale had ever been acquiesced in by Sir in this state of the proof, Sir George contended that the manufacture required a quantity of bricks as 32,156, on the eve of leaving the premises must have been done in mala fide ; which Gordons denied.

The sheriff pronounced this interlocutor :—" Finds it sufficiently established that potters are in the custom of making bricks out of the clay of the clay used in their potter-work, and that every pottery requires a large supply of bricks : Finds it not proven that a lease of a field for a pottery entitles the lessee to make bricks for sale : " And " Finds that there is no sufficient evidence of the petitioner having been engaged in the respondents' manufacturing bricks out of the clay-field on for sale, or for any other use than those of the pottery : Finds that the respondents had on hand at the time of raising this action a quantity of bricks, amounting, according to Mr Watson's report, 6 in number ; that these were manufactured out of the clay-field, and that they were not required for the purposes of the pottery, having been since removed from the premises by the respondents : Finds that although the respondents were entitled to make bricks for the purposes of the pottery, they were not justifiable in manufacturing a quantity near the termination of the lease, to be otherwise disposed of : Therefore finds the respondents liable in the value of the bricks subsequently carried away by them, approves of Mr Watson's valuation of these at £45, 16s. 5d., the interdict formerly granted to the respondents removed on caution being found to that amount, and, in the circumstances of the case, finds no damages due ; and finds the respondents entitled to expenses."

James Gordon, senior, and George Gordon, junior, as representing James Gordon, who was now deceased, brought an advocacy of this

The sheriff pronounced this interlocutor :—" Finds that,

147. under the tack libelled on, the advocators were not entitled to manufacture bricks for sale; but finds it proved that, in carrying on a pottery a great quantity of bricks is required for the purpose of the manufacture of pots: Finds it proved that, according to the usage of the trade, the bricks so required are commonly made of the coarse clay, or, as it is called, the crops or pairings of the clay which could not, without an expensive process, be made into pots: Finds that the advocators, at the expiry of their tack, were entitled either to remove the bricks which they had made bona fide for the use of the pottery, but which had not been used, or to demand the price of them from the landlord: Finds that it is not proved that the quantity of bricks which the advocators had on hand at the end of their tack, was greater than they might reasonably suppose were necessary for the ordinary use of the pottery, or that they were manufactured mala fide with the view to their being sold: Therefore alters the interlocutor of the sheriff, assoilzies the advocators from the conclusions of the action, and decerns; and finds the advocators entitled to the expenses of process, both in this and the inferior court, subject to modification.*

Sir George reclaimed.

LORD GILLIES.—I cannot concur altogether with either the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary or with that of the sheriff. The Lord Ordinary holds that the bricks had been made bona fide for the use of the pottery, and has assoilzied the advocators absolutely from the action. Now I feel satisfied that the bricks were made in mala fide, and if not for sale, they were at least intended for another work, and not for the pottery of Sir George. On the other hand, the sheriff has found Sir George entitled to the whole value of the bricks, at the market-price, which includes not only the cost of the manufacture, but also the King's duty. That I think was going too far, and it may be difficult to fix the precise amount of reparation due to Sir George, for the bricks which have been removed by the

---

* "NOTE.—It is clear that a field of clay let expressly for the purpose of a pottery, cannot be used for a purpose entirely different, that of making bricks for sale. But it is satisfactorily proved, that a great quantity of bricks is required in every pottery, chiefly for the construction of the kilns, and these bricks are made out of the coarse and bad clay called crops, or timings, or pairings, which cannot be profitably used in making pots. It is impossible to calculate before hand how many bricks may be required, because it depends upon accident, and it cannot be foreseen whether a kiln is to fail or not; and one witness, whose evidence is not contradicted, depones, That, in the event of a kiln failing, 40,000 bricks may be required. The advocators had on hand 32,156 bricks, which do not appear, therefore, to be an unreasonable quantity. The Lord Ordinary is of opinion that the respondent was not entitled to take possession of these bricks at the expiry of the lease, without paying to the advocators either the expenses of the manufacture, or the King's duty, which is levied before the bricks are fired. The advocators have been found entitled to expenses, under modification, because they have all along carried their plea too high, in maintaining that they had a right to make bricks for public sale, and that to an unlimited extent."

advocators from his premises. But the Court should fix on a moderate sum as being justly due to Sir George, and award it in his favour. No. 147

LORD MACKENZIE.—I take a view which is very much the same with that now expressed. The advocators, if they did not make these bricks for sale, at least made them for a rival work which they were about to carry on, and that was a purpose equally unauthorized by their lease, and more invidious, than if the bricks had been made for sale. But although the advocators acted unwarrantably in the manufacture of these bricks, I do not think their landlord Sir George was entitled to confiscate them simply, and appropriate the whole to himself. If the clay was his, and was unwarrantably taken by the advocators, still the cost of the manufacture and the amount of King's duty, entered into the value fixed under the judicial remit, and I cannot think Sir George entitled, in the circumstances, to all that. Both parties have pleaded their rights too high, and the Court should now award what is just, by rejecting what is extravagant in the pleas of either party. Feb. 14, 1832

Commissioners

LORD PRESIDENT.—I concur with your Lordships. Both parties have pleaded their rights too high. We ought now to award in favour of Sir George the value of the clay, as the raw material which the advocators improperly applied to the manufacture of these bricks. Probably the sum of £10 might suffice for that, and it should be made a full value, as the advocators committed a wrong.

LORD GILLIES.—I think a smaller sum might suffice.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Alter the interlocutor reclaimed against, and find that the reclaimer was entitled to the value of the clay, from which the bricks were manufactured; modify the same to £10 sterling; but find no expenses due to either party."

Law-Agent.—The clerk of a provincial board of commissioners, who was not a procurator before any court, and had no attorney's license, held entitled to charge for agent's business performed by him in a cause in which the commissioners were parties, the employment of the clerk having saved the employment of another agent.

THE defenders, the Glasgow Police Commissioners, having been found entitled to expenses in this case, mentioned ante, 389, the account was admitted to be taxed. The auditor allowed a charge for business done in the course of the proceedings by the commissioners' clerk, who, although bred in the office of a professional person, was not a procurator before any court, and had no attorney's license. THE pursuers objected to the auditor's report in so far as it allowed the

148. expenses of the clerk, who as such was a party to the process, and bound to give the board of commissioners what assistance he could without charging for it, and was besides not a regular law-agent.

To this it was answered, that the clerk was the only law-agent employed by the board, and was entitled, like any other country agent, to make a charge for business performed by him.<sup>1</sup>

THE COURT, on the ground that the defenders were entitled to employ a country agent, and the employment of their clerk in the business in question saved the employment of another person, repelled the objection to the auditor's report.

 g his lifetime George Ponton gave to James, his eldest son, an r payment of £500 out of a fund on which he had a claim.
 dmitted that he had received to the extent of £150 from this nd there was prima facie evidence that he had drawn £400.

he Ponton died in 1828, being survived by his wife and his four leaving a trust-deed of settlement, whereby he conveyed all his to trustees with powers of sale. After directing payment of his d an annuity of £80 to his widow, he set forth that he had paid able sums to his two sons during his life, and therefore appointed es to pay £500 to each of his daughters, and then to divide the of his estate equally among all the four children. On the death uster, James, the eldest son, raised an action of reduction of the d as in contravention of the contract of marriage above-mention-hich action the trustees were assoilzied. Subsequently to this ed a multiplepoinding, during the dependence of which they sold table property of the deceased, and after taking credit for the of their management, including that of defending the action at nce of James Ponton, there remained of free funds only £376.
 ow's claim for her annuity was admitted to be preferable, and, tra, Mrs Hardie and Mrs Hamilton claimed to be ranked prefer-heir brothers, under the provisions of £500 in their favour respec-ey having received nothing, while their brothers had during their life drawn an amount far beyond what the fund in medio could the sisters. On the other hand, James and George, the sons, that the contract of marriage precluded the deceased from giving ence to any of his children, and as to the alleged payments to es during the truster's life, it was alleged that so far as these nitted, which was not the case to any extent in regard to George, e made on other grounds, but of this no evidence was adduced.
 ns were also taken by them to the sale by the trustees, and to a r factor's fee.

Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Imo, f consent, that the assignee of the late widow of George Ponton

 Ponton and spouse, are entitled to be preferred primo loco and n on the fund in medio for whatever may be ascertained as the ~~sums of~~ their claims as creditors in this process: And in regard to

149. the competition among the other claimants, the sons and daughters of the said George Ponton senior, Finds, 2do, That the claimant James Ponton (the eldest son) has not instructed by any sort of evidence that he is entitled to claim or rank on the said fund in medio as a creditor of his late father, in respect of his right to salary or payment for alleged services done to his said father; and that he has made no relevant offer of proof in support of such claim: Finds, 3tio, That the terms of the trust-deed executed by the said George Ponton senior (the father), are in no respect inconsistent with the provisions of the antenuptial contract entered into by him in contemplation of his subsequent marriage, but are, on the contrary, in entire conformity thereto, and distinctly provide for an equal distribution of his whole free property and estate among the children of that marriage: But finds, 4to, That it was within the power of the said George Ponton, notwithstanding the said antenuptial contract, to have exercised a reasonable discretion in distributing the property thereby settled among the children of the marriage; and that effect should be given to the directions of the trust-deed, although the consequence might be to render the shares of the said children respectively in some measure unequal; and that the burden of proving that such directions import an unreasonable and excessive inequality, should be laid on such of the said children as might make that allegation: Finds, 5to, That it was also within the power of the said George Ponton, notwithstanding the said contract, to direct his trustees to sell and turn into money the small detached heritable properties in which he was vested at his death; and that the legality, fairness, or propriety of the sales of the said properties accordingly made by the said trustees, have not been impeached upon relevant or intelligible grounds: Finds, 6to, That there is prima facie evidence in process that the claimant James Ponton did receive at least £400 as part of his provision in his father's life; and that he has admitted, that at all events he did receive £150; and therefore finds that he can, in no view, be entitled to any place in this competition, till each of his sisters shall have drawn from the fund in medio a like sum of £150; and till his brother George shall also either have drawn a like sum in this process, or been proved to have received such a sum from his father in his life: And in respect that it appears from any thing yet seen, that the whole fund in medio (after satisfying the preferable claims of the widow and law-agent) will be more than exhausted by the daughters severally drawing the said sum of £150, finds it unnecessary, hoc statu, to determine to what farther extent the said daughters (or younger brother) might be entitled to rank, before the said claimant James Ponton could claim any thing in this competition: And in regard to the claim of George Ponton, junior (the younger son) Finds, 7mo, That it was not in the power of the father, by the execution of the subsequent trust-deed, or otherwise, entirely to exclude him from any share of the property set-

ted by the marriage-contract; but that the narrative and recital in the said trust-deed, of his having actually received, in the father's lifetime, sums amounting to no less than £500, in satisfaction of his claims under that contract, and his practical acquiescence in, and written recognition of the justice and validity of the said trust-deed, raise such a presumption of his having truly received considerable sums, as there stated, as to impose upon him the obligation of proving the contrary, before he can be admitted to compete with the sisters in this process; and appoints the cause to be enrolled, that he may explain whether he is willing to undertake such a proof, and in what way he proposes that it should be taken: Before farther answer, remits the trustees' state of intromissions, and corrected abstract thereof, to Patrick Cockburn, accountant in Edinburgh, in order that he may report whether the sum for which credit is there taken in discharge, under the title of factor-fee, is a just and proper sum to be charged in that account, and if not, what would be just and proper." *

* "NOTE.—The Lord Ordinary is anxious to bring this family contest to a close (if possible) before the expenses of litigation shall have swallowed up the whole sum in dispute. The fund in medio seems to be already reduced to something under £400, and the claims confessedly preferable are said to exceed one half of this. It is idle, therefore, to consider whether the sons have actually received £500 or upwards, since, if they have received but £100, it is plain that they have no right to compete on this fund with their sisters, who have confessedly received nothing. The pretensions of James are not very intelligible. With regard to George, the Lord Ordinary feels that there is some difficulty in holding him to the proof of a negative; and yet the father's recorded averment, in an instrument of this description, and referring to family transactions for a period of 40 preceding years, and his distinct adoption of that deed, by his taking a small payment under it, and signing the remarkable receipt in relation to it, appears sufficient to relieve the sisters from the necessity of now proving that some payments had been made to him. The factor-fee seems quite extravagant, and it would be very desirable to make some addition to the miserable fund in medio."

Harton.

GEORGE SMITH, distiller in Glenlivet, raised an action of damages against Charles Grant, residing at Glenlivet, before the Sheriff of Bauffshire. He libelled, that a verbal reference had been made to Grant and himself, to decide whether certain parties who had been employed to cast peats had duly fulfilled their agreement with their employer; that Grant and he, on 30th June, 1833, met on the ground where the peats had been cast, and proceeded to execute their duty as referees, but soon differed in opinion as to the nature of their duty; that Grant, "actuated by a determination to injure, calumniate, and defame the pursuer, upon the 30th day of June last, or on one or other of the days of said month of June last, or of the month of July following, and while the pursuer was discharging the sacred duties reposed in him, as aforesaid, did falsely, wickedly, maliciously, and calumniously say and assert that the pursuer was not a competent judge, and also that he was a partial judge; and did farther falsely, wickedly, maliciously, and calumniously say and assert that the pursuer had acted as a partial judge on other occasions, and that he could prove that the pursuer had been guilty on these occasions of acting as a partial judge, and has propagated these false, malicious, and calumnious statements widely through the country, to the pursuer's great hurt and prejudice, from all which it is evident the said Charles Grant has said, asserted, and propagated the said false, malicious, and calumnious statements, with the evident intention of traducing and vilifying the pursuer's character as an honest man, and holding him up to the public as partial and corrupt in judging of matters referred to him;" that these "false, calumnious, wicked, and malicious statements" had tended to destroy his character, and "cause him to be held up to ridicule and contempt," and had hurt his feelings, &c. He concluded for £100, as damages and solatium.

The defender denied that he had been actuated by the intention imputed to him, or by any animus injuriandi; he also denied that he had ever propagated the statements libelled; but admitted that, in No. 150.

oof was allowed, from which it appeared that the referees had got dispute, chiefly about one particular peat, whether it was twelve long as averred by Grant, or only eleven inches long as averred th; that Smith cautioned Grant to take care what he was about, ight be put upon oath respecting it, and Grant then grew hot d he would swear for no man; that farther altercation ensued, which Grant was in a passion, and used abusive and insolent e to Smith, refusing to act longer with him, calling him "a partial or a "partial fellow," accusing him of having been a partial judge y cases, and, on Smith's asking him to name an instance, naming at Craighead as an occasion where he had acted as a partial judge.
 eared that one of the parties to the reference then came on the
 , and Smith told him what had happened, upon which Grant
 d his words. During all this time Grant was in a violent passion.
 ot appear that Smith had used abusive words to him, unless the respecting putting him on oath implied an impeachment of his ling.

ese circumstances the sheriff found "it proved that the defender nted the pursuer as a partial fellow, and persisted in that repre-on, and that that imputation was aggravated by being applied to n who was in the practice of acting as an arbiter or referee; re, found the defender liable in £5 sterling of damages to the
 ; and found him also liable in expenses."

it brought an advocacy, and the Lord Ordinary "found it that, on the occasion libelled, the defender did use the injurious ions complained of, and therefore repelled the reasons of advoca-it reclaimed.

GILLIES.—I feel considerable doubt respecting this interlocutor. In a ere damages are asked for verbal slander, it is proper to look to all the tances, including the habits and rank of life of the parties. There are cusations, such as those of being a thief, or a murderer, which must be us whenever used, and must always infer damages. But the words here are erent sort. The parties here, who are in a low rank of life, fall into a hot about the size of a peat, and Grant, in the violence of passion, accuses f being a partial fellow, or a partial judge. These were improper expresspecially between referees, and I do not justify them; they should never in used, but still, in all the circumstances of the case, the use of them ut have been made the ground of an action of damages such as this. The rtiality does not necessarily imply a charge of corruption, as it

150. might merely import that an arbiter was too partial to his own views; but, at the rate, an action such as this should not have been raised. The libel states that Grant used the words "falsely, maliciously, and calumniously." Is there any proof to support a charge libelled in this fashion? I see no proof of malice, no attempt to prove the alleged propagation of these statements through the country, and no proof of any injury sustained by Smith in consequence of the words. And as the words were only used during the heat of an altercation, I think the action should be dismissed, and expenses found due to neither party.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I am of the same opinion. I think no injury to Smith has been proved, and that trifling, miserable actions of this sort, ought not to be encouraged.

LORD MACKENZIE.*—I think the case not altogether free from difficulty, but concur in the opinions now given. This was a serious action of damages, £100, founded on a statement of premeditated deliberate malice, continued for considerable time, and producing repeated and extended calumny, accompanied with great injury to character and business. It was an action bearing of great expenses, in case of any judgment in favour of the pursuer, according to a recent decision of the Court. Then, in this action, there was proved no premeditation, no malice, no repeated or extended calumny, no injury to character or to business. Nothing was proved but this, that on one occasion, at a meeting of the parties, as referees, about the value of some peats, a difference of opinion having occurred, and some words (not well ascertained) having been used by the pursuer about the defender being put on oath, the defender, apparently understanding (right or not) these words as an imputation on his honesty, or veracity, got into a passion, and in that passion called the pursuer a partial fellow, or a partial judge. I think this proof can sustain no verdict or judgment in such an action. For it shows no injury requiring any remedy. To give a judgment for even a small sum of damages, on such a proof, in such an action (which would carry expenses with it), would truly be doing injustice between the parties.

THE COURT accordingly advocated the cause, and assoilzied the defender from the action, but found expenses due to neither party.

MRS KNIGHT'S TRUSTEES and OTHERS, Claimants.—M'Neill—

Spiers.

Trust—Clause—"Free Rents."—Construction under the terms of a testamentary trust-deed, of the "necessary charges" to be deducted from the annual proceeds of the trust-estate, before the residue could be held to be "free rents," dissoluble as directed by the deed.

THE late Mrs Knight of Halkerton, at her death, which took place on the 11th November, 1834, left two trust-deeds of settlement, in favour of the same individuals, as trustees, but of different subjects, and for different purposes. By one of these she conveyed to the trustees three heritable properties, called Halkerton, Balmye, and Scotstown, appointing them, 1st, "To divide and pay annually the free rents (deducting all necessary charges connected with, or burdens on the said lands, either by law or in terms of the current leases; and also deducting the liferent annuity of £180 sterling, payable from the lands of Balmye and Scotstown, to Mrs Ann Halliburton, the relict of the late David Maxwell of Balmye), and that equally and proportionally among Mrs Isabella Morrison, the only child in life procreated of the marriage between the late James Morrison," and three other ladies (one of whom predeceased the granter), and "the survivors or survivor of them, during all the days of their or her lifetime :"—2d, After the death of the last of these ladies, to convey the estate of Halkerton to Mrs Stewart of Stenton, in liferent, and certain other persons in fee :—3d, After the death of the last of the annuitants, to sell the estates of Balmye and Scotstown :—4th, After deduction of all proper and necessary expenses attending the sale and conveyance of the lands of Balmye and and Scotstown, to pay out of the price certain specific legacies, amounting to £1500, and to divide the residue into twelve equal parts, to be paid over to the persons therein named. Alongst with the assignation to the writs and title-deeds there was an assignation to the rents. There was no provision as to payment of the expenses of the trust other than that implied in the provisions above mentioned.

Feb. 14. 1837
2d Division.
Ld. Moncreiff
T.
Morrison v.
Knight's
Trustees.

The trustees made up their titles by infestment, and disputes having arisen as to the free proceeds divisible among the three annuitants, the trustees raised a multiplepinding, with reference to the rents of the crop and year 1834, in which they, alongst with the parties among whom the lands were ultimately to be distributed, claimed that all the expenses of making up titles, including entries to the superior, and of management, as well as all the burdens imposed by law, and expenses connected therewith, as those of a process of locality, the building of a parish church, &c. must first be deducted from the rents, and that the residue only formed the free fund divisible among the annuitants.

On the other hand, Mrs Morrison, &c. contended that the only deductions from these rents meant to be sanctioned by the trust-deed were the ordinary annual burdens affecting them by law, the burdens arising under current leases, and Mrs Halliburton's annuity; particularly, that there was no ground for deducting the expense of making up titles and inventories connected with the personal estate of the testatrix, or the expense of infestments, compositions, entries with the superior, or of any process of locality.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor, adding the

151. note subjoined : *—“ Finds, that the fund in medio, consisting of rents of the heritable subjects conveyed to the trustees for crop and year 1834, which were due, though not payable, at the death of testatrix, must be applied by the trustees, in the first place, to the payment of ‘all necessary charges connected with, or burdens on the said lands, either by law, or in terms of the current leases;’ and that, quoad ultra, if any residue remains, it is to be considered as ‘free rents,’ to be divided equally among the three claimants, Mrs Morrison, Miss Lillias Maxwell, and the representatives of Miss Janet Maxwell : Finds, that the expense of making up titles to the property, and, in particular, of entries with the superior or superiors, in so far as such entries are necessary from the nature of the titles, must be considered as a necessary charge connected with the said lands, or a burden thereon by law, and as such must be paid out of the said fund or rents, before it can be held that the said rents are free rents,

* “ NOTE.—This multiplepointing comprehends nothing but the rents for crop and year 1834, due at the death of the testatrix. The Lord Ordinary cannot, therefore, decide any thing as to any other rents or fund.

“ This is not a case of liferent and fee. The full fee is in the trustees, under the obligation to divide the free rents, after deductions according to the special terms expressed. They are not appointed to give the fee to any one; but, after the lapse of the legacies of those rents, to sell the lands, and divide the price; and, as the clause appointing the disposal of such price specifies no deductions therefrom but the necessary expenses of the sales, and the special legacies provided, the trust-deed evidently supposes that all the other expenses of the trust, and all charges connected with the lands previously emerging, shall have been previously satisfied. The Lord Ordinary, therefore, conceives, that this is a special case on the meaning and effect of the trust purposes, to which the rules by which the interests of liferenters and fiars in general are determined, have no application.

“ The rents which became due while the testatrix was alive, on the term-day of Martinmas, 1834, seem to be clearly carried to the trustees by the clause of assignment of rents. But, as no rents whatever are appointed to be reserved for those to whom the price of the land is to be paid over; and, at all events, they can have no claim to any rents emerging before the failure of the annuitants, the Lord Ordinary sees no room for doubt, that, in so far as the rents in question are free, in the sense of the trust, they belong to the claimants, Mrs Morrison and others. But then it appears to him, that they cannot be free in that sense as long as there are any charges connected with the trust management, or the lands or titles thereto, unsatisfied. The trustees hold no other fund, and have no power to raise money on the fee to answer such charges.

“ The composition to the superiors is a special matter, and seems to be the chief point of controversy. But if the title was so left by the testatrix, that the lands are in non-entry, and a composition is due, it seems to be an inevitable consequence, that this is a necessary burden on the lands, and, at all events, a necessary charge connected therewith, to be deducted from the first rents coming into their hands.

“ It may be true that the trustees are, in effect, maintaining what is for the benefit of those to be interested in the price at last. But this only arises from the necessity they are under of providing for the charges affecting the lands, and disposing of the particular fund in dispute.

“ The Lord Ordinary has not overlooked the expense of the new church likely to arise. His opinion is, that it will fall under the principle of his judgment. But as it is not yet a charge on the lands, he has not thought it necessary particularly to advert to it.”

to be distributed among the claimants as annuitants: Therefore, approves No. 151. of the condescendence of the fund in medio given in by the trustees, but, <sup>Feb. 16, 1837</sup> <sup>Rowand v. Walker,</sup> quoad ultra, sustains the claim of Mrs Morrison and others, and appoints the cause to be enrolled, in order that this interlocutor may be accurately applied: Finds, that the expenses incurred by the trustees in this multiplepointing, rendered necessary by the doubts raised as to the disposal of the fund in medio, must be a burden on that fund: Allows an account thereof to be given in, and remits the same, when lodged, to the auditor to be taxed: But finds no expenses due by any party in any other form."

Mrs Morrison, &c. reclaimed.

The Court stopped the counsel for the trustees, &c.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—On the general question I have no doubt. We are here merely interpreting the meaning of this deed. It is a question of will. Mrs Knight had it in her power to declare that these ladies should be liferenters of her estate; but that is not the nature of the deed here. It is not a case of liferent and fee, but we have a testamentary deed, to which the ordinary rules of construction are to be applied. The question is, what are the "necessary charges" and the "burdens" which law imposes. The expense of making up titles, and of an entry with superiors, certainly falls under that description, and I have no doubt the Lord Ordinary has put a sound interpretation on the deed.

LORD GLENLE.—I agree. The general principle laid down by the Lord Ordinary is, that the rents to be held free in each year are only after all the expenses for that year have been paid.

LORDS MEADOWBANK and MEDWYN concurred.

16, 1837. DIVISION. Courthouse. D. THE estates of William Mackintosh of Millbank were sequestrated under the Bankrupt Act, and Alexander Aeneas Grant, writer and banker in Nairn, was chosen trustee. Grant sold the lands of Janefield and others, belonging to the bankrupt, for £2460. They were affected with two securities for £2000 each, one of which was granted in 1825, in favour of Mrs Chalmers or Walker and others, in liferent and fee respectively; the other was granted in 1830, in favour of Michael Row and of Linthouse and others, for behoof of Carrick, Brown, and Company, bankers in Glasgow. A competition on the price arose between these parties, in which Carrick, Brown, and Company objected that the infestment in favour of Mrs Chalmers and others had been so taken as to limit her real right to one parcel only of the lands. The following were the facts on which the objection turned.

In 1770 the burgh of Nairn granted a lease of a portion of their lands amounting to 17 acres, called Moss-side, for 95 years, to Alexander Ore of Knockandie; in 1778 the burgh granted a lease of a contiguous portion of their lands, called Bremner's Possession, to a different tenant, for 57 years; and in 1805 a third portion of their lands, called Janefield, and amounting to 95 acres, which was also contiguous to the other lands, was let for 57 years to a third tenant. The whole came ultimately to be in the occupation of Mackintosh. They were all parts of one property, which had always been held by the burgh under the same grant and by one tenure, under one superior.

In 1824 the burgh exposed to sale by public roup "All and whole the lands, feu-duties, and others after specified, belonging to the corporation or community of Nairn, viz. Primo, That part of the lands adjoining the Moss of Nairn, held in lease by Mr Mackintosh of Millbank, commonly called Janefield; Secundo, The ground adjoining the said moss, known by the name of Bremner's Possession, and likewise occupied by Mr Mackintosh of Millbank; Tertio, The lands contiguous to the said moss, held in lease by Miss Ore of Knockandie, and occupied by William Mackintosh, her subtenant; Quarto, The pendicle, &c.

"Article First, The said lands, feu-duties, and others, are to be exposed to sale in the different lots above enumerated, and at such up prices as shall be put thereon," &c.

At the roup, William Mackintosh bought the lands of Janefield at the price of £950; Bremner's Possession at the price of £1

ide at the price of £260: in all £1350. The Magistrates and Council of Nairn executed a disposition in his favour, narrating that Mackintosh <sup>No. 152</sup> <sup>Feb. 16, 1825</sup> <sup>Rowand v. Walker.</sup> having offered the sum of £1350 sterling for those parts of the said lands commonly called Janefield, Bremner's Possession, and that part of the lands of Moss-side occupied by William Mackintosh, as sub-tenant under Miss Ore of Knockandie, as particularly after described, and being the last and highest offerer for the said three several lots, he was by the judge of the roup preferred to the purchase." The decd then acknowledged receipt of the price of £1350, and disposed to Mackintosh "All and whole that piece of moss ground, now called Janefield, measuring ninety-eight acres, Scotch measure, or thereby, being part of the Moss of Nairn, with the pieces of moor ground lying on the north and south sides of the ninety-eight acres of moss ground, and bounded, the said moss and moor ground, hereby sold, as follows, viz. on the east," &c., "and on the south partly by the lands of Moss-side:" "As also, all and whole that farm and possession called Bremner's Possession, and adjoining the said lands of Janefield; bounded on the south and west by the said lands of Janefield: As also, all and whole that farm and possession called Moss-side, bounded on the north partly by the said lands of Janefield," &c. Immediately after this description they followed an obligation to infest, in these terms:—"In which lands and others above disposed we bind and oblige ourselves to infest and seise the said William Mackintosh, Esq. and his foresaids, upon their own proper charges and expenses, to be holden of and under the Magistrates and Town-Council of Nairn, their successors in office, in feu-farm, fee, and heritage, for ever, for payment to the town-treasurer of the said burgh of the sum of three shillings sterling yearly, in name of feu-duty, and that at the term of Martinmas yearly, beginning the first year's payment thereof at the term of Martinmas in the year 1825, for the year immediately preceding, and so forth yearly thereafter, at the term of Martinmas, in all time coming, and doubling the said feu-duty at the entry of each heir or singular successor to the said lands and others, as use is in feu-farm, and that for all other burdens or secular service which we and the remanent members of the Town-council, and successors in office, and the community of the said burgh, can ask or require from the said William Mackintosh, Esq. his heirs and successors, furth of the said lands and others before disposed, or furth of any part or portion thereof; which lands and others above disposed, with this present right and disposition thereof, and infestment to follow hereon, we bind and oblige ourselves," &c., "to warrant," &c. There followed an assignation not only of "the whole writs and evidents of and concerning the subjects above disposed," but also of "the rents and duties thereof," &c. The receipt of sasine required the bailies to "pass to the ground of the said lands and others, and there give and deliver to the said William Mackintosh or his foresaids, heritable state and sasine, real, actual, and

152. corporal possession of all and whole the lands and others particularly 1837. above specified, with the parts and pertinents thereto belonging, all lying
 v. contiguous, and described as aforesaid, and that by deliverance to the said William Mackintosh, Esq. or his foresaids, or to his or their attorney, in his or their name, bearers hereof, of earth and stone of the ground of the said lands, and all other symbols usual and necessary." Under this disposition Mackintosh took infeftment, in expediting which the notary did not make delivery of earth and stone upon each of the three parcels of land, but upon one of them only, for the whole.

In 1825 Mackintosh borrowed £2000 from Mrs Chalmers and others, to whom he granted a disposition in security. The disposition contained not only the lands holding feu of the burgh of Nairn, as already described, but also a separate subject holding burgage. The disposition first described the lands holding feu, in terms similar to those already quoted in the disposition by the burgh to Mackintosh, and coupling the three parcels of land by the words "as also;" after which it described the burgage subject, which was connected with the preceding description of lands, by the words, "and likewise." The obligation to infest was in these terms:—"In which lands and others first above disposed in security, I bind and oblige" myself to infest Mrs Chalmers and others, "and that by two several infeftments and manners of holding; the one thereof to be holden of me and my foresaids in free-bleinch, for payment of a penny Scots money, on the ground of any part of the said lands, at the term of Whitsunday yearly, in name of bleinch farm, if asked only; and the other of the said infeftments to be holden from me and my foresaids of our immediate lawful superiors," &c. Then followed the words "And in the subjects, with the pertinents last above disposed in security, I bind and oblige myself and my foresaids, at our own proper charges and expenses, duly and validly to infest and seise the said Mrs Chalmers," &c., "to be holden of his Majesty, and of his royal successors, in free burgage," &c., which referred to the subject held burgage. A precept of sasine was added "to the effect the said Mrs Chalmers and others may be infest and seised in the foresaid lands and others with the pertinents first above disposed, I the said William Mackintosh desire and require you, &c., that ye pass to the ground of the said lands and others, and there give heritable state and sasine, &c., of all and whole the foresaid lands and others with the pertinents first above disposed,"—"by delivery of earth and stone of the said lands."

In January, 1825, infeftment was taken under this disposition. The instrument of sasine bore that the parties appeared before the notary "upon the ground of the lands first herein-after described." It then narrated the conveyance of the lands holding feu, and the lands holding burgage, all as contained in the dispositive clause of the disposition in security, and, after quoting the precept, as stated above, it bore that sasine was given "of all and whole the said lands and others &

infestment in each parcel of the lands under a disposition from Mackintosh conveying these lands to them in security of a loan of the sequestration of Mackintosh, and the sale of the whole lands as trustee, he raised a multiplepoinding for distributing the price among Mrs Chalmers and others, and Carrick, Brown, and Company, according to the nature of their preferences; and Carrick, Brown, and Company, who had themselves bought the lands at the roup from the trustees, besides claiming in that process, on the price, raised a declarator of the referable nature of their right, and containing various conclusions burdening the lands of all incumbrances. In support of their action, they pleaded, that the three parcels of land called Moss-side, Moss-side, and Bremner's Possession, had been occupied on separate leases for a long term of years; that they had been sold as separate lots by Mackintosh at the roup in 1824, and that the deed in his favour described them each separately, and as mutually sold by each other; that the disposition by Mackintosh to Mrs Chalmers and others described them in the same manner; and that, as borne in their favour narrated infestment to have been given in the lands "first above disposed," which was done by one single delivery of earth and stone, upon the ground of the lands "first described," the effect of such infestment was necessarily limited only to the first of the three parcels of land. One delivery of earth and stone could carry no more than that single parcel of land, of which, delivery was made. But even if it might competently extend to the whole, still it was expressly restricted in its terms to 1837. sold in separate lots, yet as they were contiguous, and were disposed to the purchaser to be held by the same tenure, under the same superior, for payment of one slump sum of feu-duty, doubling it on the entry of heirs, they formed but one feudal tenement, and accordingly were conveyed by the burgh to Mackintosh in one disposition, under which one infestment would suffice to give sasine in the whole, unless there were any restrictive words in the infestment confining its effect to a part. But there were no such words, and therefore he had been duly infest in all the three lots, by a single delivery of earth and stone upon one of them. In like manner the claimants and defenders were duly infest in the whole, under their disposition in security. That disposition first conveyed the lands which were held feu, all of which were seriatim described; and it next conveyed the separate subject held burgage. And in the relative obligations to infest, that part of it which referred to the whole lands held feu, described them as the lands "first above disposed," and that part which referred to the burgage subject, referred to it as "last above disposed." In reference to this natural division and description of the subjects, the instrument of sasine also narrated that infestment was given "of all and whole the lands first above disposed," which necessarily referred to the whole of the lands held feu; and though such sasine was only given once, and therefore upon only one part of the lands, it was effectual to carry the whole, because the whole formed but one feudal tenement.

The Lord Ordinary, "in the multiplepointing, found the claimants Mrs Chalmers and others preferable on the fund in medio for their respective rights of liferent and fee, in terms of their claim, and decreed in the preference accordingly; and in the declarator, sustained the defences of these claimants, assoilized them from the conclusions of the libel, and decreed; and found the claimants and pursuers Michael Row and others, partners of Carrick, Brown, and Company, liable in expenses." *

* "NOTE.—The claimants Carrick, Brown, and Company, have not shown that the three farms, Janefield, Bremner's Possession, and Moss-side, are separate feudal tenements. It is proved that they are all contiguous, and it does not appear, nor is it alleged, that they are, or ever were, holden of different superiors, by different vassals, or under different tenures. An infestment, therefore, taken on any one of the farms or parcels is a competent infestment for the whole tenement. Accordingly there is no warrant in the precept of sasine, contained in the heritable bond of the Walkers, to take infestment on the three farms respectively and successively; and if there had been such a warrant it would have been superfluous.

"Besides this tenement holden in feu, Mackintosh, the common debtor, conveyed to the Walkers, in security, a second tenement, which was holden burgage. In their heritable bond, therefore, there is an obligation on the granter to infest them in the lands first above disposed, by two several infestments and manners of holding, by delivery of earth and stone; and in the subject last disposed, Mr Mackintosh binds himself to infest them in the lands, to be holden of his Majesty and his royal successors in free burgage for service of burgh used, and that by resignation, &c.; and the precept of sasine accordingly con-

ed of a clause of union, or the erection of such lands into a barony, in o make one sasine good for the whole. They are naturally contiguous to ther, and they do not form distinct feudal tenements. It was therefore ent to give delivery of the whole of these lands by tradition of earth and upon any part of them ; and, on looking at the terms of the disposition and I am satisfied they do not restrict the infeftment to any portion of the lands, re infeftment of the whole. I therefore concur in the interlocutor of the Ordinary, and am of opinion that it ought to be adhered to.

eftment in the lands first above disposed to be holden feu, and by delivery first disposed holding feu, and the subject last disposed holding burgage, bears that heritable state and sasine was given to the Walkers in the lands bove disposed by delivery of earth and stone. Nothing can be more re-than all this procedure. But the notary states in his iustrument that the ony was performed, not on the lands first disposed, but on the lands first bed ; and as the boundaries of the three parcels composing the feudal teneare mentioned separately, Carrick, Brown, and Company maintain that this nent must have been given on Janefield. But that is a matter of no conse-e, for, if the three parcels are one tenement, it is indifferent on which of the the ceremony is performed. But, secondly, Carrick, Brown, and Company

MOTION by the defender to have an action of damages, for slander dismissed, under Act of Sederunt, 29th November, 1825, § 47, in respect of the pursuer not having insisted for above twelve months after issues had been adjusted. The pursuer explained that he had been engaged in prosecuting the reduction of a decree-arbitral, in which he succeeded in January last; that he was unable to carry on both actions at once, but as the reduction was now at an end, he would be able to insist in the action of damages, and was ready to do so.

LORD MACKENZIE.—I do not think that any sufficient explanation is given, to account for this delay, or to save the pursuer from having his action dismissed under the power contained in the Act of Sederunt. There is no connexion between the two actions. The only statement is that the pursuer had not time to carry on his action of damages at the same time with his reduction. But I should have thought of that before raising his action of damages. The provision in the Act of Sederunt is an important and salutary one, and we should give effect to it wherever no satisfactory explanation is made. But if we listened to this explanation there is no end to the apologies which would be made, and jury practice would be thrown loose.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I am of the same opinion.

LORD GILLIES.—I concur also. The action must be dismissed.

LORD GILLIES.—I doubt very much whether the Court should pronounce even an order of intimation until the induciæ are expired, which the statute has allowed for bringing the defenders in the cessio before the Court, if they choose to appear. Till then, I apprehend we can do nothing; and if we order intimation of a petition like this, it affords a colour for supposing that we can competently entertain and dispose of the prayer of it.

LORD MACKENZIE.—The question of the power of the Court has not yet been decided; and as the usual order of intimation is harmless in itself, and will not prejudice any party, I think it safer to grant such an order than to refuse it.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I think an order for intimation may be pronounced.

THE COURT then ordered intimation, and, on the motion of the petitioner, directed special service of the petition upon a party who was stated in the petition to have given him a charge of horning.

Cessio.—Observed by the Court, that although, in a process of cessio, the length of the pursuer's imprisonment is an important element for consideration, where the creditors merely complain of his past extravagance or misconduct, it is altogether irrelevant where there has been actual concealment of funds, and these are still secreted by the pursuer; that, in such a case, the incarceration must be prolonged until he makes a full discovery of his estate, and sibi imputet, if this be for a protracted period. By statute 9 Geo. IV. c. 39, entitled, "An act for the preservation of the salmon fisheries in Scotland," it is provided, § 1, that whereas various Scottish statutes against killing salmon in forbidden time, and killing fry, &c. of salmon, had been ratified by 1696, c. 33, and it was expedient "that the penalties enacted by the said acts be augmented, and the period of the forbidden time altered and extended, and that sundry other regulations should be made," therefore, the act 1424, c. 35, fixing the close-time was repealed, and it was enacted that it should be close-time between 14th September and 1st February, during which "no salmon, grilse, &c., shall be taken in or from any river, &c., estuary, &c., by any person; any law, &c. to the contrary notwithstanding:" § 2. That if, during close time, "any person shall wilfully take, &c., any salmon, &c., such person shall forfeit and pay any sum not less than £1, and not exceeding £10, for and in respect of every such offence, over and above forfeiting every such fish so taken, and every boat, net, or engine by which the same may have been taken:" § 3. Penalty for trespassing on any ground, with intent to kill salmon, &c.: § 4. That if any person "shall wilfully take, &c., or sell, &c., the spawn, smolts, or fry of salmon, &c.," or obstruct the passage of salmon fry, &c., or injure any spawning bed, &c., "such person shall forfeit and pay a sum not less than £1, and not exceeding £10, for every such offence:" § 5. Penalties imposed on using a light in taking salmon; on neglecting or refusing to remove boats, nets, &c., from a fishery, during close time; and an augmented penalty, beyond that of 1477, c. 73, as to improperly constructed salmon-cruives, &c., in fresh water: § 9. "Provided always, and be it enacted, That each and every penalty provided by this act shall go to the informer, and may and shall be recoverable, with expenses, as well before the Sheriff as before the Justices of the Peace of any county, as aforesaid, wherein the same may be incurred, or where the offender shall reside, at the instance of any person or persons."

by required to carry such person before a Justice of the Peace or Magistrate, who shall forthwith examine and discharge, or commit such person until caution de judicio sibi be found, as the case may require : " § 18.

" And be it further enacted, that no prosecution or other proceeding whatever, shall be brought or commenced against any person or persons, for any offence or offences against this act, unless the same shall be laid or commenced within six calendar months after any such offence or offences shall have been committed ; and provided, that where any offender shall be punished by virtue of this act, he shall not incur the penalty of any other law or statute for the same offence."

William Robertson, merchant in Banff, designing himself " water-bailiff, appointed (under § 10 of the above statute) by the proprietors of salmon-fisheries in the river Deveron," prosecuted Richard Collins before the Justices of the Peace of Aberdeenshire, for taking salmon in close-time, in contravention of the statute, and obtained a conviction and judgment in these terms :—" At Turriff, in the county of Aberdeen, the 17th day of November, 1835, the which day his Majesty's Justices of the Peace for the said county, fined and amerced, and hereby fine and amerciate Richard Collins, vander of hardware, residing in Huntly, in the sum of £3 sterling, payable to William Robertson, Esquire, merchant in Banff, superintendent of the salmon-fishings on the river Deveron, for certain offences committed by the said Richard Collins, in contravention of the act, 9th Geo. IV., cap. 39, as particularly mentioned in the petition and complaint, raised at the instance of the said William Robertson against the said Richard Collins ; also found and hereby find the said Richard Collins liable to the said William Robertson in the sum of £1, 3s. of expenses, and if said sums are not paid within 14 days from this date, decerned and ordained, and hereby decern and ordain, execution to pass hereon, by poinding in terms of said act, and by imprisonment in the jail of Aberdeen for the period of two months, unless said sums be sooner paid."

Collins failed to pay the sums for which he was found liable, and he was imprisoned in terms of the decree or sentence. He made an application to the magistrates for aliment under the Act of Grace 1696, c. 32, in respect that in terms of that act he was " a prisoner for a civil debt or cause ;" that Robertson was " the creditor at whose instance he was committed ;" that he was not a " prisoner for a criminal cause ;" and, therefore, he was within the benefit of the act. The magistrates, after hearing parties, awarded aliment to Collins, and appointed it to be paid by Robertson as " the creditor-incarcerator," with certification of liberating Collins if he failed to aliment as ordered. Robertson presented a bill of suspension, which was ordered to be intimated to the magistrates of Aberdeen as well as to Collins, and, on answers, the Lord Ordinary on the bills (Balgray) " in respect that the question between the parties has not been sufficiently fixed in practice, passes the bill on caution, re-entire to the respondents, the primary debtors in the aliment, to payment of the same cum omni causa, if it shall be afterwards at the complainer is legally and properly liable for this burden " and the magistrates reclaimed, and the Court recalled hoc statu, mitted to the Lord Ordinary to hear parties fully on the bill and . Cases were ordered by the Lord Ordinary.

Robertson v.
Collins.

led by the Suspenders—

the preservation of the salmon-fisheries was an object of national , and had been so from the earliest times, both because they af- large supply of food to the people, and because they yielded a venue to those of the lieges on whom the King had conferred the salmon-fishing, which right was inter regalia. The killing of during close-time was just as wantonly destructive to the fisheries, ig poison into them, and thereby killing the fish by wholesale, the fishing season, would be: and both were instances of that and dangerous mischief, which, in regard to a matter of so much concern, amounted to criminal delinquency.

it it was no longer open to argument whether killing salmon in ne was a crime, as it had been declared to be so by a whole series es from 1424, c. 35, downwards,<sup>1</sup> several of which made the of- nishable with the pains of death. These statutes were ratified s 1696, c. 33; and though their barbarous severity was in total le, yet the whole statutes themselves were not so; many import- isions were still in force, and that statute which formerly regula- e-time (1424, c. 35) was only altered as late as 1828, by the sta- ler which the present question had arisen. But the whole of these ed in affixing the character of criminal delinquency to the act of almon in close-time.

ie statute 9 G. IV. c. 39, viewed the offence as criminal. It red any person to seize an offender brevi manu, if caught in the l to carry him straightway to a magistrate. It allowed no appeal : sentence, excepting to the Circuit Court of Justiciary, or, where re no Circuits, to the High Court of Justiciary, which was cog- : criminal causes only. It provided, that if the penalty was not 14 days after "conviction," the offender should be imprisoned for od not exceeding six months. And it provided generally, § 14, here any offender shall be punished by virtue of this act, he shall r the penalty of any other law or statute for the same offence." rds amounted to a declaration that the sentence was a "punish- for an offence, and necessarily implied that the offence was a cri-

4. If the offence was thus to be viewed as of a criminal character, the circumstance that the penalty should go to the informer, and be recoverable at the instance of any person who chose to prosecute, was immaterial to the present question. Collins would still be a prisoner "for a criminal cause," and so be debarred from the benefit of the Act of Grace; and besides, the prosecutor, being constituted, by the statute, public prosecutor quoad hoc, did not cease to be so by having the penalty made over to him, any more than a procurator-fiscal would cease to be so, by being made the crown-donatar of the fine, which was to be recovered under any complaint at his instance. And if the prosecutor under this statute was obliged to aliment a prisoner, it would put an end to all prosecution whatever, as the aliment would cost more than the penalty or fine, and the imprisonment would equally come to an end, in terms of the sentence, whether any part of the fine was paid or not.

5. None of the previous cases afforded any precedent for holding that this offence was not of a criminal nature.<sup>1</sup> And if the distinction was kept in view, that, any sum, whether in the form of a fine or not, which was awarded in name of reparation or damages to an individual for an injury sustained by that individual, was necessarily a mere civil debt, from whatever cause the civil right of reparation had arisen, that distinction would separate all preceding cases from this; because the sum here awarded was not given as reparation to any individual, but merely as a punishment of the offender, and was expressly described in the statute, equally with imprisonment, by the same word "punishment."

Pleaded by Collins and the Magistrates of Aberdeen —

1. It was merely malum prohibitum, and not malum in se, to kill a salmon in close-time. And the prohibition was so essentially arbitrary, that, in the very statute founded on by the suspender, the period of close-time was altered, thereby rendering it a prohibited offence to kill a salmon at a certain period, at which period such killing had been no offence whatever, prior to 1828, when the act passed. The action was not, therefore, criminal in its own nature, and was merely one, out of a class of contraventions of positive laws, such as omitting to make a due return to the collector of assessed taxes, &c., none of which, though inferring penalties, was a crime in itself.<sup>2</sup>

2. If the act was not criminal in its own nature, it could not be made so, by any reference to the barbarous severity of obsolete statutes.

3. There was nothing in the terms of 9 G. IV. c. 39, declaring this offence to be a crime, or treating it as such. The power of summarily interrupting a party caught in the act of committing the offence, and carrying him before a magistrate, did not do so. The appeal to the Circuit Court of Justiciary was not characteristic of the offence as criminal, since at appeal was allowed in civil causes of the amount of the penalty, as well as in criminal causes; and it was merely from allowing such appeal to the Circuit Court, that an appeal had been allowed, where there were no Circuits, to the High Court of Justiciary for the sake of summary procedure. In regard to the word "punishment" used in one section of the statute it was not material, for, if the offence was not in itself criminal, it could not be made so by merely describing the pecuniary penalty, or the imprisonment, incurred by committing it, as a punishment. And as there was no public prosecutor who could, as such, insist in a prosecution under this statute, that alone showed it not to be a prosecution of a criminal nature.<sup>1</sup>

4. But even if the offence were of a criminal nature, yet in so far as regarded the suspender, it had resulted merely in this, that a debt of a certain amount, made up of penalty and expenses of process, was due to him by Collins. And if imprisonment was inflicted by him on Collins for non-payment of this debt, he must, according to various precedents, bear the cost of alimentering Collins during an imprisonment inflicted by him for his own behoof.<sup>2</sup> By the terms of the statute, such imprisonment was regarded, equally with poinding, as a mere diligence "for the recovery of all penalties and expenses decerned for," and not as inflicted ad indictam publicam. Though the term of imprisonment was limited, that did not alter the nature of the debt due by Collins; and if this diligence did not produce payment of the debt, the suspender might still poind the effects of Collins if he pleased. There was no reason for apprehending that prosecutions under this statute would be stopped by refusing this bill, as the proprietors having a common interest in the fisheries might assess themselves, and alimenter convicted parties, if necessary, and thereby exempt the individual prosecutor from any such burden. But, at any rate, that circumstance could not affect the construction of the statute.

5. There were various precedents showing, that, in cases which savoured of criminal delinquency more strongly than this, the Court had held a prisoner entitled to the benefit of the Act of Grace. In particular, in one instance, where the procurator-fiscal, under a criminal prosecution for assault, obtained a conviction, and the imposition of a fine, of which one half was awarded to the private party, it was held that such party could not keep imprisonment in force against the offender, without the offender

The Lord Ordinary "having considered the bill and answers, with the cases for the parties, refused the bill, and found the complainer liable in expenses." *

* "NOTE.—The question is, whether a person incarcerated for not paying a fine imposed under the 9th Geo. IV., cap. 39, is to be alimented under the Act of Grace by the private incarcerator, or as a criminal, by the burgh where the jail is?"

"It is needless to attempt to define the precise character or boundaries of public and of private wrongs by any general or abstract principle. This is a problem which has defied the legislators and lawyers and philosophers of all ages. In reference to any actual question, the matter must be looked to practically, and with reference to rules or cases, which, whether theoretically right or not, have been positively decided.

"Nor is there much solid foundation for the practical determination of any case to be got by picking out detached words in the statute, which may seem to indicate that the wrong was meant to be treated by the Legislature as of a criminal character. The words, 'Offence,' 'Fine,' 'Prosecutor,' 'Justiciary,' 'Penalty,' &c., unless they be combined into sentences forming enactments, are of very little use, and are to be found in many statutes, which it has been determined only to introduce and describe civil delicts, not proper crimes.

"This statute treats fishing for salmon in close-time as an offence, which is to be visited by fine, the failure to pay the fine may lead to imprisonment, and there may be an appeal, as in civil cases, to the Court of Justiciary. But the delict is not raised by express words to the rank of a felony, misdemeanor, or any other known public crime, and it is only from those expressions that its being an offence is to be gathered. But there are three circumstances in the statute which are conclusive of this question.

"1. The malum prohibitum which it introduces or recognises may be atoned for by a pecuniary payment. 2. This payment must be made to any person who may sue for it, for there is no public prosecutor created. 3. The imprisonment is no part of the punishment, but merely a mode of compelling payment of the money.

"Now, whatever some of the older cases, such as that of M'Lesly, founded on by the complainer, may have done, it was solemnly determined in Clark against Johnstone, 7th December, 1787, that even in the case of a known heinous public crime, liable to be repressed at the instance of the Lord Advocate, by transportation for life, that part of the punishment which consisted of a fine to a private party was, quoad hoc, merely a debt, and that if the delinquent should be imprisoned for not paying it, aliment was due by the incarcerator under the Act of Grace. The Lord Ordinary conceives that this very marked case fixed the law, and he has found no subsequent case which tends to unfix it, on the contrary, the cases of Guthrie, 10th December, 1807; Baird, 19th January, 1825; and Campbell, 24th February, 1835, all confirm it. If (which was Clark's case) aliment was due by the incarcerator on imprisonment for an assault, because the incarcerator's interest was a fine payable to himself, how can it not be due here, where, though the public be interested in salmon not being killed in close-time, as it is in the observance of all statutes, and of all private contracts, nobody but the complainer has the smallest interest in the debt, for non-payment of which the delinquent is in jail? It is just a debt, though due ex delicto.

"The complainer thinks it expedient that, while he reaps the benefit of the conviction, the burgh should aliment. This is not a judicial consideration. If it were, the Lord Ordinary would doubt the proposition. Burghs, in

No. 156.

THE PRESIDENT.—The question raised in this case is attended with a good difficulty. But I am much moved by the consideration that this debt, of penalty and expenses of process, does not go to any public prosecution solely to the suspender for his private behoof. It is now neither more nor a debt which is due to him. It is true that he acquires it under the authority of the statute, being in a situation somewhat analogous to that of crown-doff a fine. But in the whole circumstances I incline to adhere to the judgment of the Lord Ordinary. The suspender is following out steps to recover his proper debt, for which he might have pointed, if Collins had possessed any property, and being in that situation, I think the Court are not warranted in debar Collins from the benefit of the Act of Grace.

GILLIES.—I feel this to be a question of extreme difficulty. If we re-pass this bill, there will probably be an end to all prosecutions under this Act, for, if the prosecutors have to aliment their prisoners, they will not under-expense. But that consideration ab inconvenienti does not decide the question, and I own that I feel it to be a very doubtful one indeed. But I incline to follow the interlocutor, and to find Collins entitled to the benefit of the Act of Grace.

MACKENZIE.—The case is attended with great difficulty, but I rather incline to adhere to the Lord Ordinary. The Act of Grace applies to a poor prisoner "for a civil debt," and not to the class of prisoners "for criminal causes." The question, therefore, is whether Collins was a prisoner for a civil debt or cause, or for a criminal cause. In some of the earlier decisions regarding the application of the act, it was held that wherever a fine (for delinquency, such as assault, &c.) was imposed, whether for behoof of a private party or not, and imprisonment followed for the purpose of levying such fine, the prisoner was excluded from the benefit of the Act of Grace, even in a question with the private party, because he was a prisoner for a criminal cause. It was felt to be difficult to hold that such a question was one of debt, and not truly for a criminal cause. And yet it was afterwards held to be, as between these individuals, a question of debt, and it rather seems reasonable to be, as between them, nothing more than this. Suppose that in this case, in place of a Judge fining and amerciating an offender in £10, he did something, in other words, by ordaining him to grant a bond or bill for that sum to the private party, and that such party used legal diligence for recovery of it, could it be said that it was not a mere civil obligation which he was discharging, and that the offender was liable to him in any thing else than a civil debt? Or suppose that a private party got decree for a sum of damages in name privileges, are bound to maintain criminals imprisoned at the instance of the public, acting through its official accuser, and for whom no party but the public is to provide; and a heavy burden enough it is. But in what condition may they be, if they were further bound by implication to aliment all those imprisoned for not paying fines to private parties, on account of violations of regulations of Parliament, considering that almost all the countless statutory delicts are punishable by fines, and that wherever the delinquent cannot pay by his purse, he is detained at the pleasure, and for the behoof of a private party, may contain his

156. of assygment, and that in order to recover the amount, he used poinding or arrestment; I rather think that, even in that case, though the origin or ground of the liability was of a criminal nature, yet the liability contracted was but a civil debt, and nothing more. And so also in the present case, I apprehend that, whatever was the nature of the grounds which gave rise to this liability, which Collins incurred to the suspender, still the liability itself results in nothing but a civil debt. The case is of a very peculiar nature. I may notice, in regard to a supposed difference between the words "crime" and "delinquency," that I hold they equally designate what would exclude a party from the Act of Grace if he was imprisoned for a cause belonging either to the class of crime or delinquency. I hold the words the same in this question. A fine was, no doubt, imposed on Collins; but the fine was payable to the informer for his private behoof. Thus Collins was brought under an obligation to pay the small sum in question to the informer. Imprisonment is not a part of the sentence. If it were so, it neither could be brought to an end by payment of the fine, nor even by the consent of the prosecutor himself. When a sentence of imprisonment is passed, the King may indeed remit so much of it as seems good to him, but no subject has the power of doing so. In regard to the imprisonment under this act, it is provided "for the recovery of all penalties and expenses decerned for;" and though the period of imprisonment is limited, from motives of humanity, that does not affect this peculiar character of the imprisonment, that the prosecutor may inflict it or not as he chooses. He may use the diligence of poinding or not at his own discretion, and he may enforce the imprisonment or not at his own discretion; which imprisonment, by the express terms of the sentence, is terminable at any time by the prisoner's payment of the fine to his incarcerator. In these circumstances, I do not think that such imprisonment is so essentially distinct and different from imprisonment for debt, that the prisoner is to be denied the benefit of the Act of Grace, and that the burgh must be at the expense of alimentering the prisoner, in order to enable the suspender to recover his debt. I do not think this was one of those cases which was within the view of the Act of Grace, as one which should remain a burden upon the burghs.

THE COURT adhered on the merits; but, on account of the extreme difficulty of the case, altered as to expenses, and found them due to neither party.

Entail—Settlement—Succession.—An entailer settled his estate on his son, and the heirs of his son's body in a certain order; whom failing, on his daughter and the heirs of her body; whom failing, on his own nearest heirs and assignees whomsoever; the son died without issue, and a grandson of the daughter succeeded, who had a son and daughter—Held, that, although the entail was liable to be defeated so soon as the succession should open to heirs-portioners, it was a good entail until that contingency should actually happen, and was not in the mean time defeasible at the will of the heir in possession.

In 1754, Robert Mure of Livingston and Glenquicken, executed an entail of these two estates. He had one son, Adam, and two daughters, the eldest, Jane, and the youngest, Margaret. Robert Mure, in the deed of entail, granted a procuratory of resignation for infestment in favour of "Adam Mure, and the heirs-male lawfully to be procreate of his body, respectively and successively; whom failing, to the heirs-female to be lawfully procreate of the body of the said Adam Mure, and the heirs-male to be lawfully procreate of their bodies, respectively and successively, the eldest heir-female always succeeding without division through the whole course of succession, and excluding all heirs-portioners; whom failing, as to the lands and barony of Livingston, &c., to and in favours of Jean Mure, my daughter, now spouse to Samuel Lockhart at Barma-gachan, and the heirs lawfully procreate, or to be procreate of her body, in this or any other marriage; whom all failing, to my nearest heirs and assignees whatsoever: And, as to the foresaid nine-merk land of Kirk-mabreck, &c. failing of the said Adam Mure and the heirs-male and female descending of his body, in manner above-mentioned, to and in favour of Margaret Mure, also my daughter, spouse to David Thomson of Ingleston, ay, and until Adam Thomson, her second son, attain to the age of twenty-one years complete; and then to the said Adam Thomson, and the heirs to be lawfully procreate of his body; whom failing, to the heirs procreate or to be procreate of the said Margaret Mure of this or any other marriage; whom all failing, to my own nearest heirs and assignees whatsoever."

Robert Mure died in 1757, and Adam Mure made up titles under the entail. He died, without issue, in 1802. A separation of the two estates took place, in terms of the destination. In regard to the lands of Kirkmabreck, Adam Thomson, the entailer's grandson, by his younger daughter Margaret, being past twenty-one years of age, made up titles to them, and enjoyed them until 1822, when he died without issue. The succession then opened, in terms of the destination, to the heirs of his mother, Margaret Mure or Thomson, and these were six

No. 157. daughters, or their representatives. A competition of briefs arose between the younger daughters, or their representatives, claiming as heirs-portioners, and the representative of the eldest daughter, claiming the estate, and alleging that the clause of exclusion of heirs-portioners was applicable to the destination of each of the two estates, after they had separated, as well as to both of them while enjoyed by Adam Mure and his descendants. The Court found, that, by the true construction of the deed, the destination, heirs-portioners were not excluded from the destination of the two estates had separated, and found the six daughters or their representatives "entitled to be served heirs-portioners of provision and settlement of the said Robert Mure of Glenquicken."<sup>1</sup>

In regard to the estate of Livingston, Mrs Jean Mure or Lockhart made up titles to it, as heir of entail, in 1803. She died in 1810 leaving her eldest son having predeceased her, leaving a son, James Ochterlony Lockhart Mure, he was served heir of entail on his grandmother's estate. He had two children, a son and a daughter, and in 1835, he was served summons of declarator against them, and the other heirs of entail, but the Court found and declared that he possessed all the powers of a fee-proprietor, in respect that the destination, under which he was called, did not exclude heirs-portioners, and was, therefore, in its own nature, feasible, and unsusceptible of the fetters of a strict entail. He also pleaded a plea, upon the special construction of the deed, as not imposing the fetters of the entail at all upon the heirs called after the separation of the estates. This plea was held unfounded, and being of a special nature, does not require to be farther noticed.

Defences were lodged by James Ochterlony Lockhart Mure, junior son of the pursuer, and his curator ad litem.

Cases were ordered, and the pursuer pleaded, that whenever the estate in an entail was so far exhausted, that, on the death of the last possessor, the next parties called were the heirs and assignees who were of the entail, it was an acknowledged rule that the estate, in the person of such heir, became a fee-simple. The legal principle, which operated this result, was merely, that, in the ulterior destination to the heirs and assignees whomsoever, there was no exclusion of heirs-portioners by their succession, which might happen quodocunque, the estate would divide, and subdivide ad infinitum, and it was neither according to the intention, nor in the power of the entailor to fetter these fragments of the estate, descending contemporaneously through so many ramifications of succession. But in such a case it was not necessary to wait until the contingency of the estate devolving on heirs-portioners had actually occurred; it was enough that the estate had reached that point in the succession where they were not excluded, and where their occurrence

happen at any time ; and so soon as that point was reached, the law regarded it as a defeasible tailzie. But as the Livingston entail, so soon as Adam Mure died without issue, devolved on Jean Mure, " and the heirs of her body," it became a destination which was not tailzied in any respect, amongst her descendants, but left to the course of legal succession ; heirs-portioners would accordingly take, just as in the legal descent of any other heritable estate, and it had been so found in regard to the other estate of Kirkmabreck which was destined in similar terms. As the entail was thus defeasible quandocunque by the existence of heirs-portioners, the estate had reached that point in the destination, at which, as in the class of cases already mentioned, the pursuer was entitled to hold it in fee-simple. This was more especially true, as there was no ulterior substitution, after the descendants of Jean Mure, except to the entailer's heirs and assignees whomsoever, who were the same with the heirs whomsoever of Jean Mure ; so that the destination was substantially to Jean Mure and her heirs whomsoever, which was not a destination susceptible of the fetters of an entail. And this circumstance distinguished the present from other entails where a similar defect occurred in the middle of a series of substitutions, because, in these other cases, if that individual branch of the substitution which admitted heirs-portioners, was got over without their occurrence, there were ulterior substitutions, effectually excluding heirs-portioners, which would be called into existence ; but in this instance there was no such ulterior substitution, and, through the whole existing destination, heirs-portioners might happen to supervene quandocunque ; the entail was therefore defeasible by the pursuer.<sup>1</sup>

The defender answered, that the entail contained all the requisite fetters, aptly imposed on a destination " to Jean Mure and the heirs of her body," unless there was something in the nature of such a destination, which rendered it unsusceptible of fetters. And if so, the effect would be to break a very large proportion of entails, as it was a clause of very common occurrence in destinations, sometimes in the first member of them, and sometimes in the ulterior substitutions ; but in all cases equally fatal, if the pursuer's argument were well-founded. But it was altogether unwarranted. So long as the succession did not actually open to heirs-portioners, but was open only to either a male heir, or a single female heir, the fetters of the entail must apply, and they could not be thrown off at the will of an heir in possession merely because a contingency might, at some indefinite distance of time, occur, and then defeat the entail. The clause of destination " to Jean Mure and the heirs of her body," whom failing, to the heirs and assignees of the entailer, was essentially different from the general clause at the termination of every tailzied succession calling the heirs

That was merely a clause of style, originally meant to exclude the crown or superior;<sup>1</sup> and which now did not serve to prolong an entail in favour of the heirs and assignees whatsoever, because the fetters were not imposed in their favour, and none of them had a jus crediti entitling them to challenge any act of contravention of the entail which might be executed by the last substitute, nor would they have jus crediti, even though heirs-portioners were excluded. But in this case the defender was a substitute-heir, having a vested jus crediti, entitling him to reduce every act in contravention of the entail.

The Lord Ordinary "assolized the defender from the conclusions of the libel and decerned; and found no expenses due."*

* NOTE.—"Anciently it was the law of Scotland, as it was of most of the other states in Europe which adopted the feudal system, that when all the heirs, expressly called to the succession of lands in the grant or charter to the vassal, had failed the fee returned to the superior, or failing him and his heirs, to the Crown. To prevent that rule from taking effect, a clause was early introduced in this country as matter of style, by which all grants were made to terminate by a limitation to the heirs and assignees whatsoever, either of the grantee or of some other person suggested by him. After strict entails were authorized by statute, an attempt was made to convert this clause to a different purpose from that for which it was intended, the remoter heirs whatsoever of the entailer maintaining, that it imposed the fetters of the entail on the nearer heirs whatsoever. But the attempt was successfully resisted, as the clause was plainly intended not to be a nomination of heirs of entail under the restrictions of the deed, but merely to let in heirs-general to the exclusion of the feik. Among other arguments to prove this, it was observed, that if the clause in question had been intended to prolong the entail, heirs-portioners would have been excluded, for it is inconsistent with the nature and object of an entail, that the estate should be exposed to unlimited division, by which the representation of the family by an individual is destroyed.

"But the present case is of a totally different nature. The clause which gives rise to this question is a distinct substitution, expressly confined to the heirs of the body, and followed by the clause of style to heirs whatsoever, which indicates, that then, and not till then, it was the intention of the entailer that his entail should come to an end. The fetters, therefore, must be effectual, unless, 1st, They are not imposed in apt and legal terms; or, 2dly, Unless they are applied to persons incapable of being so fettered. No objection is made to the terms in which the prohibitory, irritant and resolutive clauses are expressed. They are framed in the usual and appropriate style. But there are two classes of substitutes called in the clause; heirs-male of the body, on whom the fetters may be imposed, and heirs-portioners of the body, on whom they cannot be imposed; for, as has just been observed, it is inconsistent with the nature of a strictly entailed fee, that it should be vested in heirs-portioners. The conclusion therefore is, that as long as the first class of substitutes, that is, heirs-male of the body, remains unexhausted, the entail is good, and as soon as the succession opens to heirs-female of the body, heirs-portioners not being excluded, the estate becomes a fee-simple.

"The ingenious argument of the pursuer rests upon the obvious fallacy of confounding the last limitation or clause of style, to which a special rule applies, with a preceding substitution, to which effect must be given according to the ordinary principles of entail law. In the clause of style, heirs, whether male or female, are not fettered, because it was not intended to fetter either the one or the other. In the prior substitution, heirs-female are not fettered, whatever the intention may have been, because in the character of heirs-portioners they cannot be

The pursuer reclaimed, and, inter alia, objected that by the note of the Lord Ordinary, it was implied that all heirs-male of the body were called before any heir-female, whereas a granddaughter or granddaughters by the oldest son, were preferable to the said oldest son's younger brother. LORD MACKENZIE.—I think the interlocutor is quite right, and that the note of the Lord Ordinary, merely means that where there are sons and daughters of an heir of entail the destination is first in favour of the sons successively, before it calls the daughters; pointing out the manner in which a class of substitute heirs are called, on whom the fetters are effectually laid, before the succession opens to the daughters.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I think the interlocutor quite right; and if it were otherwise, any tailzie whatever might soon be brought to an end. The last clause, in every destination, is in favour of the heirs and assignees whatsoever, and, according to the pursuer's argument, an heir in possession is not bound to wait until the contingency arrives of the succession opening to the parties called under this clause of style; it is enough for him that it may one day open to them; and as it is liable on the occurrence of that future contingency, to be defeated, it may equally be defeated now. That is just his argument when he maintains, that, because, under the existing destination the succession may one day open to heirs-portioners, and be thereby defeated, it may therefore be defeated now, although he himself has a son in existence, defending against this action. But whatever is to become of this entail hereafter, it is enough for the Court that it is a good entail as it now stands, both in regard to the pursuer and his son, and it may continue a good entail for an unknown length of time. Had the succession opened to a single heir-female, that might perhaps have been a case less free from doubt; but, as it stands, I see no room for doubt whatever.

LORD GILLIES.—I think the interlocutor right.

precedents on which the pursuer relies do not touch the question. In the cases of Cassels and Leslie, the action was brought to enforce the entail against the last substitute by parties called merely under the clause of style. Thus also in the case of Watt; by the failure of Robert Watt, and the heirs-male of his body, the substitution to his heirs and assignees whatsoever, that is, to those called by the common clause of style, opened; and it was in the character of heirs under that clause exclusively, that the defenders in that case attempted to enforce the tailzie against Barry. In the present case, the defender, James Ochterlony Mure, younger, is called by an express substitution, and not by the clause inserted to exclude the tail. He is capable of being fettered, and may be succeeded by a series of heirs-male with the same capability.

It is thought unnecessary to take notice of the pursuer's argument, that the tailer did not mean to continue the fetters after the succession divided. The words are too express to admit of that construction, and more particularly the clause with regard to bearing the name of the entailer.

No expenses have been found due, because this appears to be the first case in which the question at issue has been tried, and it is a family suit rendered up in the inaccurate style in which the settlement has been framed."

Settlement—Faculty—Provision to Children.—1. A testatrix made a provision in her settlement "for payment to my daughter, in liferent, for her liferent alienably, and to her children, in such proportions as she may appoint, and for the residue thereof, equally among such of them as shall survive me, share and share alike, in the sum of £3333, 6s. 8d.:" nine children survived their grandmother the testatrix, but two of these predeceased their mother, without issue; their mother, in exercise of the faculty, executed a deed of distribution, allotting the sum of £440, in various proportions, among six of the surviving children, and the whole residue to the seventh:—Held, 1st, That, immediately on the death of the testatrix, a jus quiritium vested in each of the nine children then alive, to some share of the sum which their mother could not deprive them; 2d, That the omission to allot a share on account of the two children who predeceased their mother, and which would have fallen to their representatives, rendered the deed of appointment conform to the will of the testatrix; and 3d, That the deed of appointment being thus disconform, must be altogether set aside.—Observed that it was competent for any one of all the children to object that the deed of appointment was invalid, although the challenge was rested, not on the failure to allot a share to the objecting, but to any of the other children.—Question whether the allotment of a share to any of the children would have been equally fatal to the deed of appointment, with the total failure to allot any share at all.

Feb. 17, 1837. THE late Mrs Ramsay of Barnton, mother of Alison, Lady Marjoribanks, left a settlement containing a provision in these terms, "for payment to the said Dame Alison Marjoribanks in liferent, for her liferent alienably, and to her children in such proportions as she may appoint,"

Marjoribanks.

A question arose among the members of the family whether valid exercise of the power, or faculty, conferred on Lady Mar-by Mrs Ramsay's will. On the one hand, David Robertson, and members of the family, or their representatives, excepting the ider Sir William's settlement, contended that the whole appointt be set aside, and that each of the nine children who were alive th of Mrs Ramsay, or the representatives of such as had since were now entitled to a ninth share of the sum of L.3333, 6s. 8d., ase of no appointment having been made by Lady Marjoribanks.
her hand, Sir William's trustees contended that Lady Marjoriduly executed the power. In these circumstances, the trustees Marjoribanks raised a multiplepinding, and minutes of debate red.

ess the power conferred by Mrs Ramsay's will was duly executed, appointment by Lady Marjoribanks must fall to the ground, m must be divided in equal shares as provided by Mrs Ramsay
e of no appointment at all being made by Lady Marjoribanks.
r such power or faculty was stricti juris, and could not be exer-
l, unless in exact conformity with the will of the granter.
the terms of Mrs Ramsay's will the liferent allenarly of the sum, ged on Lady Marjoribanks, and the fee vested in each of the m soon as Mrs Ramsay died.<sup>1</sup> Lady Marjoribanks had no power

1837. of totally depriving any child of its share, though she was entitled to exercise a fair discretion in apportioning the fee amongst the children.<sup>1</sup>

3. By the settlement of Lady Marjoribanks no part of the sum was allotted to the representatives of Edward, or of Charles. But as a share in the fee had vested in each of them at the moment of Mrs Ramsay's death, this omission was as fatal to the appointment, as if both had not survived, and been omitted. The allotment of a special share of £100, to Sir William, and the farther allotment to him of the residue, after paying the other special shares mentioned, did not remove the incompetency of the deed as ultra vires, or afford the means of doing so, by paying the sums out of such residue to the representatives of Edward and Charles. For there still was no share allotted by Lady Marjoribanks to the representatives of Edward and Charles, and unless such allotment was made by her, the whole appointment was void.

4. Any one of the children had an interest in founding on the defective nature of the appointment; so that, even if the representatives of Charles and Edward had acquiesced, it would not have sustained the appointment against the challenge of the other children. Because the appointment must be invalid, unless executed by Lady Marjoribanks herself, in conformity to the power conferred by Mrs Ramsay's will; and if she had not done so, no third party could now cure the defect. And therefore, even if a full ninth share was now offered to be set apart for Edward's creditors from the residue allotted to Sir William, in satisfaction of the share which should have been allotted by Lady Marjoribanks to Edward's creditors or representatives; and another ninth share for Charles' representative; that could not validate the deed of appointment by Lady Marjoribanks, as it would not render her proper deed more conform to the will of Mrs Ramsay than before. It must therefore fall altogether.

Pleaded by Sir William's trustees—

1. The power of Lady Marjoribanks was absolute and unqualified in distributing the legacy among her children, and it was validly and effectually exercised.

2. Even if necessary to allot a share to each child and the representatives of each, it must be presumed, that, as David was the representative of Charles under the settlement of Charles, the £100 was allotted to him by Lady Marjoribanks, both in respect of his right as a child, and as the representative of a deceased child. And in like manner, as all the other children were next of kin, and, in that sense, representatives of Edward, it must be presumed that his share was allotted among them, and that the share given to each were given, pro tanto, in respect of their representing him.

3. But assuming that Lady Marjoribanks was bound to allot a share to the representatives of Edward, and to the representatives of Charles, and iled to do so, the only result would be that of now finding each of parties entitled to one ninth share, just as in the case of no appoint-having been made. So far they might have an interest to challenge pointment, but no farther. And the claimants were willing if necesto pay these sums out of the residue allotted to Sir William, and the of appointment quoad ultra should be sustained.

The shares of the other en might have been diminished, but certainly would not have been sed by Lady Marjoribanks, had she known that it was necessary to wo more shares than she did. And if Sir William's trustees were it to abide by the deed of appointment, even after paying two ninth to the representatives of Edward and Charles, there was no other who possessed a title or interest to challenge the appointment. e Lord Ordinary reported the cause.*

ED GILLIES.—The question here is of a very peculiar kind ; but I agree in a with the Lord Ordinary. In determining the case, it is necessary to put a

The trustees have pleaded, that the sum allotted to each child by Lady ribanks must be held to include what each was entitled to, as the representa- t legatee of the children who predeceased their mother. It is plain, from the in which the appointment is expressed, that this was not the intention of Marjoribanks ; and if it had been her intention, the matter would have been leable, because no distinction is made between the sum given to each in his own right, and the sum given in right of the deceasing child. 189. just construction upon the will of Lady Marjoribanks, but it is also necessary to put a just construction on the will of Mrs Ramsay: And Mrs Ramsay's will requires our first attention, as it is the governing instrument, and the will of Lady Marjoribanks, so far as regards this sum of £3333, 6s. 8d., can only be valid if it is conformity with it. Now it is clear to me that the one is not in conformity with the other. It was the enixa voluntas of Mrs Ramsay that all the children of Lady Marjoribanks, surviving Mrs Ramsay, should get the sum, and that each one of them should have a share. That has not been done. Two of those who survived Mrs Ramsay have been left out of the deed of distribution, two more have received shares which are nominal and elusory, and which are given merely as a colourable compliance with Mrs Ramsay's will. I consider that the allotment of a share, so small as to be merely elusory, is in substance the same thing as if no share at all had been given; it is in fact an evasion of the will of Mrs Ramsay, under the pretence of being a compliance with it. However I am not forced to decide on the effect of an elusory allotment in this instance, as there was absolutely no share whatever allotted to two of the children, who, by Mrs Ramsay's will, were entitled each to a share. From the moment of Mrs Ramsay's death, the fee of that sum was in the children who survived her; two of them have been denied all share and interest in the sum, by the deed of appointment of Lady Marjoribanks; and as I think that deed is therefore not conform to the plain import and intention of Mrs Ramsay's will, it is invalid and must be wholly set aside.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I think the whole appointment must be set aside, and that the distribution must take place, as provided by Mrs Ramsay's will, in the event of no appointment at all having been made. I rest my opinion on the circumstance that no share whatever has been allotted to two of the nine children, surviving Mrs Ramsay, each of whom was entitled to some share. In regard to the other point noticed by Lord Gillies that two of the legacies are elusory, that is a point which depends so much on circumstances, and is always so much a question of degree, that I wish to refrain from giving an opinion whether or not these were elusory legacies, intended to give a mere evasive compliance with the will of Lady Magribanks; or, supposing them to be so, whether or not that circumstance would entitle the Court to set aside the appointment. It is not necessary to decide these questions, and I rest my opinion entirely on the fact that two of the children received no share at all.

LORD MACKENZIE.—I concur with your Lordship in thinking that the deed of appointment by Lady Marjoribanks must be set altogether aside. And in doing so, I shall not enter at all into the question which has been adverted to by Lord Gillies respecting the effect of an allotment of elusory shares to two of the family. Perhaps I might entirely agree in principle with his Lordship if it was necessary to go into that question; but we do not require to decide it in this case. The first matter requiring attention in construing the settlement of Mrs Ramsay is whether Lady Marjoribanks was bound to allot a share of the sum to each of the children who survived the testatrix, or only to each who survived herself. But as the sum was left to her "for her liferent use alienably, and to her children in such proportions as she may appoint," I think the fee, which was thereby left expressly to the children, vested in them immediately on Mrs Ramsay's death, subject to the exercise of a power of distribution by Lady Marjoribanks. I consider, therefore, that she was bound absolutely to allot a proportion of the fee to each of including those who predeceased herself, so as to go to their representatives.

those who survived her. But she did not do this; she did not duly use the power with which alone she was intrusted. The appointment made by her is therefore invalid, and the provision for equal distribution which Mrs Ramsay was to be made in the case of no appointment by Lady Marjoribanks, must take place. Two children have been entirely omitted. Had a share been allotted to each, as Lady Marjoribanks was bound to have done, it is probable that it might merely have been to diminish the residue allotted to the late Sir Marjoribanks. But it might have been otherwise; it might have had the effect of altering each and all of the allotments which have been made; and as the allotment was bestowed on Lady Marjoribanks alone, there is no possible remedy now left of making a new allotment. The whole deed of appointment must be set aside.

for Sir William's Trustees, enquired whether it was the decision of the Court that the deed must totally fall, or whether the allotment of the sum of £3, 6s. 8d. to each of the two omitted members of the family, should be made, as that would be placing them on the same footing as if no allotment had been made, while the others were left as fixed by Lady Marjoribanks.

MACKENZIE.—The whole deed falls. Unless the power was validly exercised, no part of the deed can stand. It is impossible to say, if Lady Marjoribanks had been aware of the necessity of allotting a share to each of these members of the family, or their representatives, what share she would have allotted to them, and such allotment would have affected the other shares left by her.

PRESIDENT and GILLIES concurred; and the Court found that the deed of appointment must be wholly set aside; that an equal distribution of the sum of £3, 6s. 8d. must take place as in the case of no appointment having been made; and that one share must go to each of the children of Lady Marjoribanks who survived Mrs Ramsay, and to the representatives of such of the children as were now deceased.

In a reduction of the verdict of a Jury, obtained in a competition of briefs, as erroneous and contrary to the evidence, the Court, reviewing the whole evidence led before the inquest, reduced the verdict; 2. In such reduction no particular effect is to be given to the verdict of the inquest, but the Court have the power of reviewing the case on the merits of the evidence on both sides, and deciding accordingly.

- ab. 17, 1837. THE late Thomas Gifford of Busta, in Zetland, and his wife Elizabeth Mitchell, commonly called Lady Busta, lived during the beginning and middle of last century, and had a family of four sons and three daughters, besides other children, who died in infancy. A female relative, of the name of Barbara Pitcairn, resided in family with them in the house of Busta. On the 14th May, 1748, Gifford's four sons and their tutor, John Fiskien, were all drowned by the upsetting of a boat. Some months thereafter, Barbara Pitcairn gave birth to a child, the father being John Gifford, the eldest of these four sons. The other three sons left no issue. This child was named Gideon Gifford, and educated in the house of Busta; the mother subsequently removing to the town of Lerwick, where she remained, retaining the name of Pitcairn till her death in 1766. In 1752, and the following years, Thomas Gifford executed various deeds of entail and other deeds, conveying his whole property in favour of Gideon Gifford, and his heirs-male. He died in 1760, and was succeeded by Gideon, who took up and possessed the estate of Busta under these deeds till his death in 1811. Gideon

 32, Arthur Gifford of Ollaberry having taken out a brieve for rved "nearest and lawful heir-in-general to the deceased Thomas of Busta," Arthur Gifford of Busta took out a competing brieve g served in the same character, and the brieves were thereafter stion, therefore, depended on the legitimacy of Gideon Gifford, establishment of a marriage between John Gifford and Barbara which was alleged by the defender. The inquest was proceeded ore Lord Moncrieff, as junior Lord Ordinary, and a Jury of after, Gifford of Ollaberry brought a reduction of the service with ry conclusions as to his being the nearest lawful heir of Thomas on grounds which are stated as follows in his pleas upon the record :

 e verdict and service now challenged are erroneous, and ought air in general of the late Thomas Gifford; but the defender's s disproved, while there was sufficient evidence before the Jury general of the said Thomas Gifford.

least the said verdict and service are erroneous, and ought to be at the defender is not the nearest heir in general of the d, whereas the pursuer is the nearest heir in general

161. of the said Thomas Gifford; and the pursuer's claim is sufficiently instructed by the evidence which was led in the competition of briefs, or will be sufficiently instructed by that evidence, and the additional evidence now tendered on the part of the pursuer.

3. The said service being reduced, and the pursuer's claim instructed, it ought to be found and declared that he is the only nearest lawful heir in general of the said Thomas Gifford.

The defender, on the other hand, pleaded, that the pursuer was not the nearest lawful heir in general to the deceased Thomas Gifford of Busta, mentioned in the summons, and that the defender alone was entitled to and had been rightly served and retoured in that character.

The pursuer having moved, after the record was made up, to be allowed to adduce new evidence at once, and independently of the import of the proof already taken, the Court, on the matter being reported by the Lord Ordinary, remitted to refuse the application in hoc statu.<sup>1</sup>

Thereafter his Lordship pronounced the following interlocutor, adding the subjoined note, which contains a general view of the nature of the evidence and its character : "—The Lord Ordinary having considered

" NOTE.—Considering the peculiarity of this case—the extent of discussion it has received—the trial having required about ten diets, and the pleadings before me occupied nine days,—and the impossibility I have found of agreeing with the jury, I think it my duty, avoiding all needless details, and not attempting even to notice minute statements or arguments, to put the parties fully in possession of the general views on which I have proceeded in disposing of it.

" It is an action instituted by the pursuer for having a verdict, finding that the defender is nearest and lawful heir in general to Thomas Gifford, set aside.

" This Thomas Gifford, formerly of Busta, in Shetland, died in the year 1768. He had once four sons, the whole of whom were drowned together in May, 1748. It is certain that the three youngest died bachelors; but the basis on which the verdict under reduction rests, and must rest, is, that the eldest son, John, had been married to Barbara Pitcairn, who produced a son, called Gideon, the issue of the wedlock, though not born till after its father's death. If this child was legitimate, the defender, who is his son, is heir-of-line of Thomas, his father's grandfather. But the reality of this marriage is denied; and if the denial be well founded, the character of heir-of-line belongs to the pursuer, who is the eldest son of Thomas's youngest daughter, there being no issue of his other two daughters alive.

" After some manœuvring in the country about services, in the course of which advantages, but not more than the ordinary ones, were attempted to be taken, the parties brought forward their claims fairly and openly in a competition of briefs, which was tried by a jury before Lord Moncrieff.

" The substance of the case for the defender is, that Barbara Pitcairn was by birth and manners an equal match for John Gifford; that he had paid his address to her; that this ended in a private marriage on the 8th of December, 1747, in the procreation of Gideon, the defender's father; that this union was contracted during the few months it lasted, from fear of the husband's mother, Mrs Gifford, called Lady Busta in the proof, an able and imperious woman, who, it was known would be averse to the marriage, and could easily have made her husband desert any son who had displeased her; that the marriage was dissolved in May, 1748, by the death of the husband, who was drowned by the upsetting of a boat; that this accident also proved fatal to John Ficken, the clergyman who officiated

the marriage ceremony, and to the three other sons of Thomas, two of whom and the clergyman had been the witnesses; that a regular certificate was found on the person of John Gifford when his body was recovered two days after the accident; that the marriage being thus disclosed came to be publicly acknowledged; that Barbara Pitcairn, though obliged to manage herself, so as to humour her mother-in-law, was reputed and treated as the widow; that the posthumous son, Gideon, was universally, or nearly universally, considered as the heir; and that, accordingly, he succeeded to the estate in the year 1760, when his grandfather died, and held undisputed possession of it from that time to the year 1811, when he died, and was succeeded by the defender, who has been in possession ever since.

"The substance of the pursuer's case is, that John Gifford's marrying Barbara Pitcairn was highly improbable, she being in a much lower rank of life, and it being known that Lady Buxton, though she had tolerated her as an humble companion, would never endure her as a daughter-in-law; that, accordingly, there was no cohabitation, and no marriage; that the certificate of marriage is a forgery; that the reputation of Gideon Gifford was that of a bastard; that he himself frequently acknowledged this, directly or virtually, and on occasions when it was his interest to vindicate his legal status if he had believed that he possessed it; that, in particular, he never took up the character of heir-of-line by a service or otherwise; that he possessed, and whatever be the result of the present proceedings, must retain, that estate merely under a special deed, which the grandfather, who executed it, might have made in favour of any person he chose; that though this possession has never been, and never could have been, legally disturbed, the objections to his and to the defender being considered as the heir-of-line, have been long stated in ways sufficiently plain, and sufficiently offensive, to have compelled any person, conscious of having a right to that character, to take legal measures for establishing it.

"These views were submitted to a jury, which decided by a plurality of voices in favour of the defender. Hence the present action for having that verdict set aside.

"The pursuer of such a process has always a strong presumption against him from the fact of the verdict, and no Court ought ever to be anxious to diminish its force. But, in estimating it on the present occasion, three circumstances, appearing on the face of the proceedings, must be considered. 1st, Of the 15 jurors, 13 were legal practitioners. 2d, The Court was adjourned, and often for long intervals, about 10 times, its first sitting being on the 9th of November, 1832, and its last on the 7th of February, 1833. 3d, A printed copy of the whole parole testimony (except one deposition), and of such part of the documentary evidence as the party thought material, extending in all to about 214 close printed quarto pages, was put into the hands of each jurymen, two days before the senior counsel were heard, and about 10 days before the Judge summed up and the verdict was pronounced. I am far from presuming to blame these proceedings, some of which, by necessity, as the law stands, of taking down the evidence in writing, may have appeared convenient and perhaps unavoidable; but they form a bad preparation for a sound verdict; in so much that they are never practised, and could not be suffered, in any ordinary trial.

"The whole matter has again been sifted and discussed in the course of this action, and it is impossible not to feel that the case requires great consideration; minute attention to its material details, and the steady application of general principles of evidence.

"The onus probandi is on the defender. He is the claimant. And the pursuer has nothing to prove; because his case is conceded, or at least it is clear, provided it be not interfered with by the defender making out a case which excludes his. The defender does undertake to prove that John Gifford and Barbara Pitcairn had been married.

161. verdict brought under reduction cannot be maintained on the evidence 1837. hitherto adduced, and that upon this evidence the claim of the defender

"In the Record, he makes the general averment, that they were married persons, but he does not state any particular way in which the marriage had been constituted. But his evidence contains no serious attempt to establish any marriage, except one by actual celebration. Questions are, no doubt, repeatedly put, with an apparent desire to indicate some marriage of a different description, such as whether witnesses did not understand that Gideon 'had been begotten on the head of marriage,' or 'on the head of a promise of marriage.' But promise must be left entirely out of view; partly because it cannot be proved solely by parole testimony, and there is no other evidence for it here; partly because even this testimony does not establish the fact. There is not one of the witnesses who has any reason for believing such a promise to have been given beyond mere report. They had heard it. There is no indication of any attempt to prove a marriage by cohabitation as husband and wife, or by mutual interchanged declarations, or by conjugal behaviour. Every thing of the kind is excluded, by the admitted facts, that the alleged union only subsisted about five months, and that it was studiously concealed. Marriage, by actual celebration, therefore, is the one on which the defender does, and must rely.

"Now it is admitted, that the only three persons named or known as having been present, being the clergyman and two of John Gifford's younger brothers, were all drowned along with John himself, and there is no proof of their having previously violated the secrecy imposed upon them by their being engaged in this private transaction. Margaret Gifford, (an unsafe witness, however), makes an old butler say that he was particularly drunk 'on the occasion' of the marriage; but even she does not report him as having stated that he was actually present at the ceremony. (Def. 49, F.) In these circumstances, the paper produced as a certificate of marriage, which is said to be subscribed by these three persons, forms the only direct proof of the fact. The defender's case accordingly rests so much upon this certificate, that if it be withdrawn his defence must fail. This makes it indispensable, before advancing to any other facts or views of the case, to ascertain how far this document is to be received as genuine, and what effect is to be given to it.

"The paper is in the following terms:—

" 'At Busta, 8th December, 1747.—These certify, that this day, John Gifford of Busta, younger, and Barbara Pitcairn, there, were duly married in presence of William Gifford and Hay Gifford, his brothers, by JOHN FISKEN, Minister.

" 'WILLM. GIFFORD, witness.

" 'HAY GIFFORD, witness.

"It is most material to trace the history of this document.

"It is said to be subscribed by John Fiskén, as minister of the parish. The extracts produced from the presbytery records show that this person was ordained assistant to his father, the proper minister there. The ordination was vitiated by such obvious and flagrant irregularities, appearing on the face of the extracts, that if the proceedings had been reviewed in the Supreme Ecclesiastical Court, they must have been set aside. But as this was not done, the ordination must be taken in this question to be valid. Now, this marriage, if it took place, was without proclamation of banns. No proclamation is proved; none is even asserted; and all suspicion of it is excluded by the admitted desire and necessity of concealment. The idea of a regular marriage would be inconsistent with every page of the defender's evidence. But celebration of marriage, without proclamation, was then as it is still, a grave criminal offence, punishable in the Court of Justiciary by banishment for life, and ruinous, ecclesiastically, to any clergyman. It is extremely improbable that a minister should not only commit this offence, but that he should put a signed confession of his having done so into the hands of another; especially a minister who knew what sort of an informer he exposed himself to. If this guilt, if detected, he incurred the displeasure of Lady Busta.

Gifford v.
Gifford.

This paper is said to have been found upon the person of John Gifford, when it was recovered, two days after the fatal accident. But it is very remarkable that although every thing that occurred on that occasion must have been attended to with attention, and although Barbara Pitcairn, who had an interest in making innocence instantly clear, is said to have been on the beach, no human eye has seen it by whom the writing was then seen. The two witnesses who are most immediately into connexion with it are Laurence Johnston and William Williamson, both of whose fathers assisted and were present at the finding of the body, and whose sons tell what their fathers used to say. Both of them are very exact as to many particulars. Johnston mentions the precise day of the accident, and of the finding of the bodies; the hour of the night, as marked by the striking of the watches in the water, when the upset had taken place; that it was his father who lifted John's body, 'the dredge taking hold of the thumb,' and when it was brought ashore, 'there was plenty people, besides Miss Pitcairn, who saw it.' But neither of them give any distinct account of what the paper was; it is not to be wondered at, for they both state that their fathers did not see it. Johnston says 'that he has heard that a paper was found on Mr John Gifford's body.' That his father told him that he had never seen the paper that was found on John Gifford's body.' Williamson says, 'That his father did not see the above-mentioned as having been found on Mr John Gifford's body, but he saw it. Depones that his father could not tell him the contents of said paper, and he did not, and could not read it.' This witness also specifies a person of the name of Anne Laurenceson, a servant in the house of Basta at the time, who told the same story about a paper being found, but adds, 'that she never said she saw the said paper, and deponent knows that she could not write.' Another witness for the defender, James Williamson, who had often conversed with another person who was in the dredging boat, after saying 'he supposes the paper found on John Gifford's body was marriage-lines,' adds, 'that he cannot say that any one ever told him they had seen said paper.' Margaret Gifford, to be sure, makes up for this, by stating, on the authority of her deceased mother, that the paper was not only known, but that, after being found on John's person, it and a corresponding one, which was in the custody of Barbara Pitcairn, 'were both laid down on the table in presence of the servants, and sworn to before the Sheriff; and that the deponent's mother said, that she had sworn to them before the Sheriff, Mr Malcolmson.' But this statement, which, if true, must have been capable of being corroborated by many others, rests on the evidence of this solitary witness; who, or whose informant, is contradicted by the decisive fact, that, at this time, Malcolmson was a boy, and not Sheriff of the county. The fact of the writing, if found, not having been exhibited at the moment, is established indirectly by this circumstance, that, although there came in to be an impression on the minds of certain persons, that some writing or paper had been found, very few of them agree in their account of it. It is described as 'marriage lines' (21, C.); as 'a letter' (23, A.); as 'a paper concerning marriage'; as 'a promise of marriage, or something acknowledging the child,' (34, A.); as 'marriage-lines from the Session-Clerk'; as 'something consistent with marriage'; as 'a paper from her to him'; as a letter 'showing that the parties were married, or that they are to be married.' The variety of description may increase the probability that some paper or other had been found. But it is also a circumstance which generally a mere rumour of such a discovery; and, considering the decisiveness and of the document in question, it greatly diminishes the probability of it. The parties were in a situation in which the possession of writings from or even of regularly interchanged declarations, far short of marriage, is and therefore, the actual celebration of a marriage can never be held blished by any document of which the authenticity and the precise words known. The defender, therefore, is bound to maintain this specific writing. I do not feel that he makes an advance towards doing so, by proving though prevalent impression, that some paper or other had been found. Barbara's assertion of her marriage, at the moment of the catastrophe which it (assuming such an assertion to have been made), and thereby incurring of harshness and abuse if she could not prove it, goes very little to blish this particular document. She might have other writings which she to be sufficient; and, even the consciousness that she had no such evidence over would, with some temperaments, only increase the intensity of as on which alone her fate depended.

"If this writing had really been found, it is very difficult to resist the notion, that the family would have soon put it to its proper use. A short time they had recovered their surprise, and checked imposture, might not be unnatural. But continued silence on the subject of such an attestation more, any course of conduct inconsistent with it, cannot be explained by the suspicion that they never heard of the existence of the paper, or that they trusted it. It is impossible that the writing could have existed, and been to others, without being known to old Busta. His whole sons had been at that moment, and one of his earliest consolations would have been in proving that he had still a lawful grandson. It is true that Lady Busta, have been hostile to the marriage, was hostile to the recognition of Barbara as her son's widow; and it is possible, that this feeling might make in anger, even go the length of endangering the status of her grandson. But it is out of nature to suppose that it could operate to the effect of concealing the certificate, or refrain from publishing it permanently. She knew the importance of giving Barbara the status of a woman once married, she was still alive. But she never did so, though strongly tempted. He died in 1760, having previously executed an entail of his estate in favour of his grandson, whose legitimacy was thus made a point of family honour. But the certificate was not brought forward then. Barbara died in 1766, and the cause was thus removed. But it was allowed to remain unseen and unheard of by Busta herself died in 1769, when the last restraint was withdrawn, and was in the hands of the family. Still nothing transpired about this which lay unknown by any mortal from the time it is said to have been discovered in 1748, till about the year 1798 or 1799; when, after the silence of half a century, it is said to have made its second appearance.

"The account of its revival then is contained in the important testimony of Mrs Hutchison (p. 37.) and Mrs Bruce (p. 42.) two witnesses for the pursuer. The pursuer has endeavoured to discredit these witnesses by other evidence in appreciating them, I take their story as they themselves give it.

"Mrs Hutchison's statement is, that when Mrs Bruce of Symbister John Gifford, and called Lady Symbister in the proof, was one day examining a chest of drawers which had belonged to her mother Lady Busta, for some time expected to have been stolen, a grey paper parcel was found, containing a sealed paper; that the seal of the parcel being broken, there was found a letter, addressed to Lady Symbister; that the witness read the first part of the letter; that Lady Symbister read the first part also, and that as she was turning the leaf 'a note fell out of the letter on the ground before them;' that ant lifted the note; that Lady Symbister looked over it, and said 'it is my other's marriage lines with Barbara Pitcairn; that she read that paper to the deponent, and gave it to the deponent in her own hands:' That Lady Symbister as so much agitated that she was obliged to lie down in bed, but rose again in an hour or two, and made the servants be called in; before whom she formally announced the discovery of the marriage lines; after which she did not put the two documents into the grey paper again; but 'laid them in another and a better drawer,' which was in her own room.

Def. 38,

"An attempt is made to confirm this witness by her sister, Mrs Sutherland, who says that she had repeated the same story to her. No corroboration can be more futile, and if it had been objected to, it would probably have been found inadmissible. Mrs Bruce, however, was present, and to a certain extent concurs in the same general story. But there are some discrepancies very material to be attended to in appreciating the evidence of both.

"1. Mrs Hutchison says that this took place early in the morning. (Def. 38, D.) Lady Symbister having risen 'about 6 o'clock in the morning,' (40, E.) Mrs Bruce says 'that it was about twelve o'clock mid-day when this took place,' (44, C.) 2. According to Mrs Hutchison, the drawers stood 'in a sort of lumber room,' (38, C.) According to Mrs Bruce, 'they stood in the corner of Lady Symbister's sleeping room (44, C.), and there was no furniture in that room, so far as she knows, that had come from Busta: 'That the deponent has been many times in the lumber room and there was no chest of drawers there,' (46, A.) 3. Mrs Hutchison swears that it was she who found the parcel, (38, E.) Mrs Bruce, that the deponent saw Lady Symbister find the marriage lines, and that she took them out of the chest of drawers in her own room,' (44, C.) 4. Mrs Hutchison states, 'that this took place in the month of July, immediately preceding Lady Symbister's death, and she died near to the Martinmas of the same year,' (39, D.) Mrs Bruce 'being interrogated how long it might be after this, that Lady Symbister died, depones, That it was about two years, and depones, That she is sure it was two years, and the deponent continued in the service till about a fortnight before Lady Symbister died.' She died in November, 1799, (37, C.)

— 44,

"Unimportant discrepancies strengthen credit. But these inconsistencies are material, and though they may not evince skilful concert, they imply a degree of inaccuracy, which, in a story depending on these two witnesses alone, nearly destroys its evidence. But there are statements in each deposition, taken separately, which provoke a stronger repugnance to the testimony, than what is produced even by these contradictions.

"Mrs Hutchison says, that she read the first part of the letter, and that the certificate was put into her hands, and 'that she saw that it was marked with damp rust in the middle,' (39, B.), and that 'it was neither written in a very old hand, nor in a very new hand,' (39, A.) But her perusal of it was very slight, she 'just read it as she could make it out, and cannot say how often she read it,' (41, D.)—Her powers of reading are not great. She was a menial servant, and as she herself states, 'not a scholar,' (39, B.) 'Depones, That she cannot write, and never was taught to write, but she can read legible writing; that her brother was at the school when she was learning to write, and she happened to learn some letters with him. And being given a paper, marked No. 108 of process, and desired to read the backing thereon, she reads the words, 'Report, Act and Commission,' and the words 'at the place of,' and the word of 'Gifford,' but depones that she cannot read the other words; 'and being particularly directed to a word which the Lord Ordinary now has down on the record, as the word 'witnesses,' depones, that she cannot read the word,' (41, E.) The words by which she was thus tried, though not eminent for distinctness, are at least as distinct as the certificate. Now, she swears expressly that the two papers were redeposited in another and a better drawer, 'she never saw them again,' (40, B.; 41, A.) Yet when examined in the case an interval of at least thirty-two years, she recited almost the exact terms of the certificate, including the names of the witnesses, and the precise date, without the paper, and swears that she had so described it before it had been lately shown to her, (39, F.), and that 'she so described the paper when she was first asked a question concerning it' (39, A.) She accounts for this by stating, that, reading it herself, Lady Symbister read it to her and the other servants, and she has a great memory, particularly for old Shetland ballads, of which 'repeat some hundreds in wholesale,' (39, E.) This last statement may be true; but the recitation of the minute terms of a prose certificate, after a long interval, from pure recollection, is very improbable.

"Her memory breaks out suspiciously again, in the remembrance of the words of the following formal address, which she says Lady Symbister delivered to the assembled servants. Something being said about the lace: 'Depose Lady Symbister said, No, it is a better thing we have found this day; and I have called you together for: That Lady Symbister then said, 'The news that I have to declare to you are, that I have found my dear brother's marriage lines this day, and I desire you all to declare it to any person in the house as far as your influence will go.' An address not very likely to have been delivered or remembered; especially as the simple and continued exhibit of the certificate, would have been more natural and far more efficacious. She is successful in narrating the contents of the letter: Depones, 'That Lady Symbister said in the letter, that it was the last letter which Lady Symbister would write from her; that she was sorry that she had carried her resentment so far as to her son's marriage, for she knew it; but that she did not like that a lady should be in the house of Busta, who would dispute the authority with her; and that she was dying blessing to her daughter, and enjoined her to publish her brother's marriage, and hoped that she would obey the dying injunction of her mother in her most important letter has never re-appeared, either to confirm or contravert. Lastly, Though the witness had been thus solemnly desired to promulgate the coverly, she can only specify two individuals, an old man called Theodore John Hutchison, to whom she can remember telling it, 'though she may have told it to several persons.' (40, C.)

"Mrs Bruce, though sworn by the last witness to have been present when the servants were addressed, says, 'that the lady neither told the deponent to tell that the lines were found, nor forbid her to do so; that she merely mentioned she had found them.' (45, E.) She does not say, that the lady made any or gave any injunctions, or read the certificate, (43, F.); and that she (deponess), 'heard no more about the marriage lines, and that Lady Symbister mentioned the subject again to the deponent, or in her hearing,' (44, E.),—she 'never saw the said paper, since she saw it in Lady Symbister's hands deposed to,' (43, G.) Yet the certificate being shown to her in Court, after two years, she 'depones, that that is the very paper.' But the judge thought it his duty to record this fact. 'The Lord Ordinary certifies, that the witness answered instantly upon the paper being handed to her, and without having or examined it.' (43, G.) She herself admits, indeed, that, 'she never saw the inside of it, and knew it only by the spots which appear upon it,' (43, C) though certainly spotted, it does not appear to me to have any such very prominent spots as to warrant this confident and hasty identification; and I cannot expect, that if any old-looking paper had been shown to her she would have been equally clear.

any other witness who is examined as to all this, is Mrs Hughson, who is the pursuer to prove that no such scene occurred. I think that this is the case she admits that she was absent twice, and though only for a few days it is possible that it may have happened just when she was away. But it is very important indirectly; for the sensation made by such a discovery, in a secluded place, could not soon die away, and she must have heard of it. Hutchison says, 'That there was much conversation about the letter in the family, and in the island, and the deponent and the servants accordingly, as they had been desired; that it was in consequence generally known on the island of Whalsay, that the letter and certificate had been found.'

2.) But Mrs Hughson, who, being the housekeeper, may be supposed to be an intelligent person, swears that she never heard of it; and 'that she heard any of the servants in the house of Symbister speaking of a certificate having been found, and depones that if such a thing had been found she must have heard of it.'

3.) The only thing that could have got the better of all this would have been, that the letter had been followed by the immediate, general, and continued, disclosure of the documents; which, moreover, was the natural course. It was the reverse. But it is not pretended that they were given or exhibited to the deponent. The mother left her dying injunction to her daughter to keep the gratifying fact, that her dead brother had been married, and that his son was now the owner of the family estate, was legitimate, and gave her two documents which this could be proved; but, instead of publishing them to the world by depositing them with her nephew, Lady Symbister merely bids her secret them, and then quietly locks them up. The letter, though said to have been put into the same drawer with the certificate, has never since been seen; the certificate, after this single display, only reappeared in the year 1805, when the unfortunate circumstances attended its third and ultimate disclosure.

4.) The other of the pursuer was Mr Andrew Gifford of Ollaberry, who is reprehensible in his son in his rights, but certainly not in his iniquities. It is proved 3.) that Ollaberry had purchased a chest of drawers in the year 1802, which belonged to Lady Symbister. On the 10th of September, 1805, he showed the letter to the agent of Gideon, (Def. 36, E.) repeating what he had stated before, viz., that in these drawers he had found a certificate of the marriage of Gideon's father and mother, a copy of which he enclosed. This is the first time the document is ever brought openly to light. The paper so transmitted was the certificate produced and founded on by the defender. For several years after a great deal of correspondence took place between Ollaberry on the one part, and his son on the other part, in reference to this important paper; Ollaberry always making offensive charges, or dark insinuations, about its authenticity, trying to extort hush-money; and Gideon and his son meeting this, not with perfect prudence, because they ought instantly to have tried to quash the charge if they believed it to be so, judicially, but with no want of honest defiance and refusing to bribe him. At last, Ollaberry died in 1810, But, in February of that year, he made what he called a solemn written declaration (p. 143.), not only that the certificate which he himself had transmitted was forged, but that it had been forged by him, and this at the instigation of Gideon.

5.) The strength of this declaration mainly, the pursuer maintains that the certificate must now be treated as thus forged. But some things must be considered in this result be adopted. The idea of a person alleged to be usurping the status of legitimacy, applying to the true heir to fabricate evidence for in itself not very credible. But besides, no such conclusion can be rested on evidence. Ollaberry is utterly incredible on this point, or in this cause. 'he was false at first or at last, he was certainly most false in one of his acts and probably in both. Forgers professing penitence are never good witnesses when disinterested and corroborated. But this one is not corroborated, interested. The scroll of the declaration is in the handwriting of William derson of Bardister, one of the subscribing witnesses, (Def. Proof, 67, E.), and is superabundant evidence of virulent hostility on the part of this person to Gifford, and of a general character, qualifying him almost for any thing as to hurt an enemy. The illegitimacy of Gideon, would have brought the property very near Ollaberry's own family, and accordingly he avows that 'make this solemn declaration for the benefit of my own family, and all other concerned,' (143.) It was under the impression of this interest, that 'from de motu, he practised what he calls the 'innocent deception.' An attempt to confirm him, by showing that the certificate is in his handwriting. But unsuccessful. None of the witnesses can discover any resemblance, except Barclay, whose opinion, however, is extremely faint, (Pursuer's Proof, 43, I he is so had a judge of the matter, as to think that other two papers shown are in the handwriting of Ollaberry, as to both of which he is unquestionably wrong, (Pursuer's Proof, 43, G. 44, A.)

"If the statement made by this person originally, had been without fiction, it might have been maintained that the defender ought not to suffer subsequent delinquency. But, unfortunately, his first assertion was tainted with the same falsehood and selfishness that mark his last. His first communication was by a letter dated 10th January, 1803, (Def. Proof, 36, G.), mentioning the discovery of the certificate, and sends a copy of it, but makes a valuable condition necessary for the delivery of the original; and he expressly states, that out of that consideration the original shall never appear. 'The consequence of you and your family you cannot but put the proper value on; but I declare original shall never appear till you possess me of the renunciation you promised This bribe was not given, and in his next letter of the 24th of March, 1804 (36, D.) he intimates that the certificate had been lost. 'I am sorry to have you that the certificate which I promised you was put up with other papers sent home, when I left the country, and must have been lost, for they never reached home; nor any letters at that time, of which I have never as yet been able to procure any account.' And so the matter stood for another year and a half, until, on the 10th September, 1805, he writes a third letter, avowing that his statement was a wilful falsehood, and that he now enclosed the certificate had never been lost, (Def. 36.) His subsequent letters from about this time, show that in all his varying and inconsistent statements, he had no other object than extortion. There is one of them, dated the 14th December, 1808, in which he has even the audacity to avow that he had long been preparing for this by possessing himself of the Busta family papers, (Def. Proof, p. 67.)

"No reliance whatever can be placed on such a witness; and as he stands alone and utterly uncorroborated, as to the fact of his having found the paper in a box belonging to Lady Symbister, that most material circumstance must be left unproved. No doubt he did produce a paper, which I think is not established to have been forged by him; but whether it was manufactured by any body else, whether it was found in a situation which identifies it with the document, Lady Symbister is said to have placed in her repositories, are very different questions. An attempt is made to prove that the paper of the certificate must have been manufactured before 1748. But Mr Macdonald, on whom the point depends, (Def. 54.) says that it either might or might not; and at any rate it was n applying the challenged to the genuine signatures, because the latter are ways written by each of the subscribers in one uniform way—a circumstance detracts greatly from the defender's evidence; for it implies that he has not ed a clear standard of genuine signature for the Court to compare with. But nature of William Gifford, the first witness, differs in three marked particu-

It must always be important, and in particular it may determine, or shift the

Now, in appreciating this writing on the present occasion, it is to be observed : is not subscribed by the wedding parties, but only by the minister and two ses. Of the latter, the eldest was only seventeen years of age, the younger fourteen. (Def. 59, B.) The clergyman was not only guilty of a crime in engaged in such an affair, but he was guilty of a moral offence, greatly dimi-g the credit which might otherwise be due to a person of his sacred function.
 ust have known that proclamation of banns was avoided, not for any of the

"Nor does the copy produced receive any support from the pari which, as it now exists, contains no entry on the subject. An entry o riage, indeed, could not be expected. But it is stated by some of the witnesses (15, C.; 23, C.) that they heard that Barbara Pitcairn had be before the kirk-session, when she gave up John Gifford as the father o and as the session record for this period has been lost, and is said to be the hands of Gideon Gifford, the imputation is put upon him of having it. There is nothing whatever in this. The evidence, though not clear, i of the records having, at the suggestion of the Presbytery, been sent who was the principal heritor in the parish, upon the death of the clergy year 1781. The son of the clergyman states expressly that he himself him (Pursuer's Proof, 37, B.); and the minutes of the kirk session, to defender refers (p. 69.), in order to show that they were committed to t of that body, does not establish the fact. They show that other things to the session, but not the record. But, besides, there is not a vestige of Gideon Gifford mutilated the record; nor is there any thing in his cl general conduct to make this probable. The imperfections of the volu accounted for without any such supposition. What remains of it, shows very irregularly kept; the minister's son cannot tell how many volumes Gideon; and John Anderson, a subsequent session-clerk, swears that i the tearing out of leaves from the record, was one of the pastimes of h the minister's children (Defender's Proof, 30, 31.) The want of an entr subject, therefore, may be a misfortune, but it is an innocent one, in Gideon was concerned, and it is impossible to take the hearsay of two o nesses in place of the book. So the certificate stands without any di corroboration whatever.

capacity of judges, and subject to be reviewed in the same man- Gifford v.
Gifford.

There are no facts in reference to what occurred before the marriage, that are either way. Every thing of the kind is excluded by the admitted anxiety and concealment, under which the whole affair was arranged. The defender, no doubt, says, that in spite of this the addresses of the parties had been sufficiently liberal, to raise an expectation that they would be married. (Def. 22, F.) If it is a fact, I should doubt its being favourable for the defender's case; but if there was no resolution to conceal, or none strong enough to repress appearances, there ought to have been more of them, if the intention to marry was intended. But the fact is not established. It is only mentioned at second hand, in report of certain dead witnesses, and resolves into inferences said to have been drawn by these deceased observers from circumstances not explained, and on which as to which mistake is common. Accordingly, Mrs Ross, one of the pursuer's witnesses, says that her mother and grandmother told her that it was intended, 'the minister, who was courting Miss Barbara Pitcairn.' (Def. 7, D.) The only fact sworn to is by Margaret Gifford (Def. 47, G.), who (but only on the alleged authority of her deceased mother), describes one scene between the parties, which, though it indicates affection, by no means necessarily evinces conjugal affection.

The pursuer, on the other hand, attempts in his record to make the marriage probable from Pitcairn's inferiority of station. There would be nothing in this, if the fact were established. But no inferiority either of birth or manner is proved, but the reverse.

The result is, that there is little in the evidence as applicable to the period before the marriage, which makes its taking place either probable or improbable. Three individuals say, that deceased people told them, that when the matter was to be discussed after the death of John Gifford, they then remembered to have seen or heard something, not specified, from which they supposed that a marriage might take place; while others who had equal opportunities of observation say that they never heard or saw any thing of the kind; but all the evidence on either side makes it plain, that deducting these faint or fancied recollections and suspicions, the union, though perfectly natural, was divested of all external indications of marriage.

There is not a vestige of evidence as to any thing that occurred at the alleged marriage itself. The certificate is dated 'Busta,' but this only refers to the place where that paper was made out. Because the whole facts, and particularly the absence of Lady Busta, whose possible appearance would rather have marred the probability, make it certain that no marriage ceremony was performed in her house before John Gifford and Barbara Pitcairn. The only other place spoken of by the pursuer is the house of Symbister, in the island of Whalsay, which is expressly stated by Margaret Gifford to have been the scene of the marriage. If so, it is not probable why the certificate was not made out there. The travelling distance between the two spots is not proved. It might be useful to know the probability of the pursuer marrying at Symbister, and writing an attestation of that fact on the day in December at Busta. Margaret Gifford states also, that there was so much concealment in the transaction, that she was told that it was signalized by domestic dissipation. But her inaccuracy appears in this other statement, that the marriage took place within a few weeks of John Gifford's death. 'The marriage came within a fortnight or four weeks after it.' (Def. 49, F.)

The situation of matters while the alleged marriage subsisted, continued free as before of all facts evincing or constituting conjugal status. This period is an entire blank.

—It occurs after the marriage was dissolved, a correct estimate is indispensable towards any sound disposal of the case. They

161. ner as the sentence of any other inferior Court.) The rules in 1837. to motions for new trial, introduced along with the recent use relate chiefly to the repute in which Barbara Pitcairn and Gideon Gifford held, as the widow, and the lawful son of John Gifford, and to the closeness of the near connexions of the family, as evinced by their conduct in the matter.

"On the former of these subjects (which occupies a very large portion of the testimony), there is little room for doubt as to the state of the fact. The evidence establishes clearly, that the repute was neither entirely in favour of the marriage nor entirely against it, but that it was divided. This is so plainly the result, that it is quite unnecessary to analyze the depositions. Notwithstanding much just criticism by both parties, there is a strong body of evidence on one side, not only in favour of the marriage and the legitimacy, but to the effect that no opposite opinion was ever heard of, and an equally strong body on the other side of exactly a contrary tendency. If it were necessary to decide on the relative credit due to either class of witnesses, I should give the preference to the pursuer. Many of them are of a higher description, and more free from the contagion of local prejudice; and I am not aware that any of them can be detected in deviations from fact too important and too gross to be counted for from ignorance or forgetfulness. Some of the most necessary to the defender provoke distrust.

"And, to a certain extent, the opinions of each set of witnesses can be traced to causes which impair or destroy their weight. On the one hand, the people have a pleasure in suspecting flaws in pedigrees; and those of the defender had considerable encouragement here, from the undoubted fact of the want of registration of the marriage and the want of registration. On the other hand, there was a positive disposition among the connexions and dependants of a resident in the priory, to maintain the purity of the family blood; in which, in this case, were supported by the rumours about the certificate. The extent to which the reputation of legitimacy rests on this supposed document assists us greatly in appreciating that reputation. One witness, who is confident that there was no marriage, says, 'That she never heard of any other evidence of it than the lines.' (Def. 9, C.) Another, who was alive in 1747, and is equally confident, says, 'heard that the evidence of the marriage was some papers found on John Gifford's body.' (Def. 12, F.) A third, whose father, like the father of the witness just referred to, saw the body found, deposes, 'That her father heard evidence that the paper above-mentioned, and that the subject became a speculation among the people.' (Def. 14, G.) The same exclusive reliance on this document is expressed by many others. For example, by the Rev. Mr. Clay, the son of a minister of the parish, who, being 'interrogated whether he had heard of any other alleged evidence of John Gifford's evidence than this certificate,' deposes, 'That he never did.' (Pursuer's Proof, p. 36, A.) Mr. Hume, witness for the defender, being asked, 'Whether it was the prevailing opinion in the country that Gideon Gifford was a natural child?' Deposes, 'That was. That he first heard something to the contrary of that report when the lines were produced.' (Def. 35, A.) And the sheriff-substitute of the county being 'interrogated what was the general report of the country as to the legitimacy of Gideon Gifford as being legitimate or illegitimate?' Deposes, 'That he generally spoken of as a natural child down to the year 1808 or 1810, a certain certificate came to be talked of. That it was then he first heard of it as to his being illegitimate.' Another witness, called for the pursuer, in the defender's cross-examination, that she heard 'that there had been no marriage between Barbara Pitcairn and John Gifford; and that she

Barbara had not had these to have shown, Gideon Gifford would not have admitted to have been John Gifford's child.' (Pur. 10, C.) So that the reputation a great measure rested on a fact which is not proved.

As an example makes it necessary to observe, in general, that repute, even if it is clearly established, is a fact which, if its application be not well considered, is extremely apt to mislead. There are situations in which the mere existence of a generally prevalent opinion is itself an ultimate fact in questions of status. For example, in cases of alleged marriage said to have been contracted or not by circumstances, and particularly by conjugal behaviour; because in a case resolving into the mere consent of the parties, when such a report exists, or what it rests upon, every moment during which they know it, and do not deny it, is a virtual recognition by them of its truth. Or when the events to which the general belief applies, are so very remote, that they are lost in antiquity, leaving but the impression which they originally produced survives. In such cases the hereditary conviction may or must be adopted in evidence, partly because it is all that can be obtained, and partly because it may fairly enough be presumed, that at first it rested on solid grounds, though these cannot now be examined.

But the repute founded upon, in the present question, never arose till the marriage was dissolved. It is made to bear upon John Gifford, to the effect of showing him to have been married, after his death. And the original circumstances, though certainly not recent, are still within the grasp of ordinary memory in so much, that they have all been explained by the testimony of living persons, either telling what they themselves knew, or repeating the statements made by themselves, by those of the immediately preceding generation.

Accordingly, there is scarcely any valuable witness, who declares his conviction in favour of the legitimacy of Gideon Gifford, who does not explain the grounds on which this conviction rests; and these resolve into circumstances of which the Court can now judge as well as they. There is one witness, James Greig (9, B.), who, after mentioning some circumstances as the foundation of his opinion, adds, 'that he really believes that there were other evidences if he could find them.' But this reference to forgotten matter is almost peculiar to this individual.

It is difficult to open a page of the proof, without observing that every part is founded on the circumstances with which evidence has now made the matter familiar. The paper supposed to have been found on John Gifford—the discovery of a corresponding paper with Barbara Pitcairn—Lady Busta's real or imagined dream—the discovery of the certificate, first by Lady Symbister, and afterwards by Ollaberry—the habit of hearing it talked of—the recognition of the certificate by the family—these are the facts which the witnesses themselves give as the foundation of their own and of the public persuasion. Whether these be sufficient grounds for the prevailing opinion, is a different question. But being the grounds on which it is now explained that people thought and acted, and the facts being ascertained, very little weight is due to the mere repute. It is the duty of the Court to disregard the verdict of the local public, and to examine its foundation—to sift the evidence itself, and not to repose upon the traditional opinion of former ages.

The doubt of legitimacy will always produce opposite interests, and feelings, and passions in different branches and connexions of families, each of which is habituated to its own view, and hears nothing else within its own circle. Legitimate and the illegitimate factions in this case derived their faith from partial considerations, or such detached occurrences, as moved each of them separately. Ollaberry was a known enemy of Busta; and a very respectable witness, a merchant in Liverpool, on being asked his opinion, candidly deposes, 'That I am at Ollaberry, and was likely to adopt the impression of the family there.'

161. tion, the Court have the power of reviewing on its merits the proof led before the inquest, and even of allowing new proof if necessary, and deciding upon the whole case, either reducing or confirming the verdict<sup>1</sup>

(Pursuer's Proof, 33, E.) The natural operation of such circumstances makes an undivided repute on such a subject a very rare occurrence.

" But the understanding of the parties themselves, and of their immediate connections, stands in a different situation from that of strangers. Such persons may be supposed to have been cognizant of the truth, and their conduct is the only safe exponent of their real feelings.

" If they had been satisfied from the first, or became satisfied afterwards, that there had truly been a marriage, I hold it to be certain, that they would therefore have acted on that conviction. There ought, in this view, to be no discoverable difference between this and any ordinary family. Some of them had the strongest temptations to get the legitimacy fixed, and to confer status without delay; in so much that the feeling is said to have extended even to Lady Symbister, whose family was brought nearer the estate by the death of her brothers without lawful issue, but whose affection for them, or for any offspring they might have left, is said to have prevailed over all selfish views. The defender proves, that, when she discovered the certificate, 'she was very joyful, and said it was the best news she had heard for twenty years.' (Def. p. 48, F.) Nevertheless, the proof not only fails to establish any line of action consistent with these feelings, but establishes the reverse. It shows that the relations either disbelieved the marriage, or were doubtful of it. They vacillated, and in a way which is unaccountable, except on the idea that they had misgivings; and while they avoided taking any course likely to bring matters to a crisis, manœuvred to make Gideon's legitimacy be received by the world without discussion.

The conduct of those who best knew the feeling of the family is explained by a few of the most respectable witnesses. The Reverend Principal Jack's father 'was tutor in the family of Gifford of Busta, and had charge of Gideon Gifford, but of no other pupil.' (Pur. 31, D.) The Principal's belief is against the legitimacy, and he depones, 'That he has no information derived from his father relative to the family of Busta; because his father always discouraged any conversation on the subject; and his information was entirely derived from other sources. That the deponent means that his father discouraged any conversation relative to the birth of the said Gideon Gifford.' (Pur. 31, D.) If this silence had been absolute, it might possibly have been ascribed to an aversion to speak of the private marriage. But the witness says, 'that he was always instructed by his parents to believe that Gideon was either the real or the adopted representative of the family.' (31, G.). The entail in his favour was made by this time, and his representing the family, no matter how, was the only fact cared for.

" This is confirmed and carried to a greater extent by the Reverend Mr Barclay, another nephew of Bruce of Symbister, whose father was the minister of the parish, from 1751 to 1781. 'Interrogated, whether he ever heard his father speak or express any opinion whether Gideon was legitimate or illegitimate? Depones, Never. He has already said, his father never spoke to him on the subject. Depones, That he never heard his mother speak on the subject. She died when deponent was very young, so that he hardly recollects having seen her. Interrogated, if he ever heard any of the family of Symbister talk of the late Gideon birth? Depones, Never, nor did he ever hear Sir John Mitchell or his ask of it. (Def. 37, F.) This aversion to speak of it was most prudent families were afraid—unnatural if they were confident.

Gifford, indeed, swears, that so far from there being any aversion, was christened, and with great family rejoicing, in the house of Busta ;
Thomas Gifford of Busta held up the child to baptism : That the were called in and ' desired to drink the health of Gideon Gifford, either e," or " heir of Busta," and all this in Lady Busta's presence. It is im-to reconcile this with any of the leading and undisputed facts. It is re-to the main parts, even of the defender's own case, particularly to the of old Busta and his lady; and it would be difficult to save the witness painful imputation, were she not protected by only professing to repeat as told her by others.

And did the members of the family act, on occasions when the facts of their are clearly ascertained ?

Barbara Pitcairn had the double motive of interest and of honour, both for and her child, to insist on being acknowledged as John Gifford's widow.
 desecration, therefore, in any denial of her rights, especially considering her character, is a strong symptom that she was conscious of their invalidity, that she was in the nearly equally unfortunate predicament of having no their soundness. Yet, she followed no steady single course.

On the one hand, certain things are sworn to (at second hand) powerfully in her. Such as her stating at the time of the accident, and when she first her position, that she had been married to John Gifford—a dangerous for her to make to Lady Busta (Def. 4, C. ; 6, B.); and her resisting temptation, held out to her by Lady Busta at a subsequent period, to look some evidence of the marriage which it was supposed that she was in need of. Mrs Admiral Fraser (Def. 46, F.) and Mrs Winchester (54, C.) deponed that the mother of the one, and the father of the other, told them that she had been present when these temptations were held out, and that Miss Pitcairn resisted them, saying, ' that her honour was more than all she could
 ;' and that she ' persisted in this till her dying day, though she lived in poverty.'

On the other hand, these feelings are contradicted by long and important passages in her life. It is quite certain that she did not assert her right to the situation of Gifford's widow uniformly, or conduct herself in all respects as undoubted widow. She wore no mournings. (Pursuer's Proof, B, 9.) She was buried as Barbara Pitcairn. (Pursuer's Proof, 73.) No doubt, Lady Busta, who, it probably managed the funeral, was alive when she died; but the estate was previously settled upon Gideon, as Lady Busta's grandson; and after it is difficult to understand any feeling that could induce that woman to encourage doubts, which she knew existed, by permanently degrading the mother and child on the face of the parish record. But the fact is, that she was not married, but lived as Barbara Pitcairn. She was never known as any thing other than Barbara Pitcairn. It was it merely the name of widow that she sunk. Mr Barclay, the attendant of the family, and in great intimacy with them, ' depones, That he has heard that Gideon Gifford's mother was Barbara Pitcairn. Depones, never heard her spoken of by any other name. Depones, That she was never called to be the widow of John Gifford, so far as the deponent ever heard.'
 (Pursuer's Proof, 42, C.)

It is other evidence to the same effect. But her submission to this treatment, that it is endeavoured to be accounted for by ascribing it to the influence of Lady Busta. This might have operated a certain length, but it could scarcely make her continue such an unworthy us. This is an action for reducing and setting aside the verdict of a jury sacrifice, after her son's interests were fully secured, and after she must have that his legitimacy was questioned. The Rev. Mr Barclay and others as she always maintained that there had been a promise of marriage. The solution which explains both parts of her conduct is, that she thought that the tion to marry saved her honour, and entitled her morally to say that she widow, but that she was aware that legally this was not enough.

"Lady Busta's behaviour was less equivocal. The whole proof test evidence of her aversion to recognise Barbara as her daughter-in-law. Busta could never bear to look upon the woman.' Yet she uniformly of the boy. 'The first time Gideon was brought to see her, she laid her on his brow and said, that brow should make a man of him yet, having immediately recognised the likeness of her son.' (Par. 36, G.) Being thus partial to I cannot account for her fixed and undisguised hostility to the mother, upon the principle that she was satisfied that there had been no marriage need not have liked her; but if she really believed that Barbara was the mother of that child, why should she publicly degrade her? And her even towards her grandson is incomprehensible on the idea of her belief of his legitimacy, and consequently that his status did not depend on skill. It is the defender's statement, that she had early got possession of a certificate of marriage; that certificate which is now held to be nearly correct. But instead of putting down all surmises by exhibiting it, she locked it up, it could never be discussed, and never even re-appeared by any act of hers when, after about 50 years, it was discovered by her daughter, it is another of the defender's case, that it was found, accompanied by a letter from her that daughter described, as saying, 'that it was her mother's last letter enjoining her to declare her brother's marriage with Barbara Pitcairn, and I was very glad to do so, for she had long known it, and her mother's injunction her had kept her back from declaring it.' (Def. 38, F.) If Lady Busta had been satisfied that all was right, why her first injunction to conceal? and then, posthumous direction to a respectable daughter to proclaim that her brother was not a bastard?

"This last statement, however, depends upon the testimony of Mrs Hunt whom I very much distrust. But there is safer evidence. Lady Busta's husband died in 1760, and Gideon was not of age till 1769; and, during this period of ladyship and her brother, Sir Andrew Mitchell, acted as his tutors, under the direction by the deceased grandfather; but she was the principal manager, was in every thing she meddled with. Now she was aware of the proceeding which Gideon's illegitimacy was expressly stated. It is set forth in the SWERS for Thomas Mount of Garth to the PETITION of Gideon Gifford of (Par. Proof, 84.) It is possible—but considering the character, very improbable that she did not observe these statements in a pleading. But similar observations made directly to herself. Mr Anderson, the family agent, told her, in a memorial on these affairs, in 1760, 'In the present case there can be no tutor-at-law, 76.), plainly because of Gideon's bastardy, and consequent want of relation 1761, she sends a very sensible memorial to Mr Anderson; to which the same year, sends an answer (Par. 77.), in which he distinctly tells her, though Gideon be entitled to the estate of Busta, because it was expressly conveyed to him, the rest of the real property 'will belong to your daughters, and the heirs-at-law.' She sends observations on these answers, on the 4th of Jan. 1762, in which she says, 'Lady Busta observes what is noticed by Mr Anderson in the deed of tailzie, of not bearing an assignation to the heritable debt Anderson sends her another memorial in 1765, in which he tells her that proceeding to act upon the fact that the real property, not expressly conveyed belonged to the daughters as heirs-at-law. Gifford v.

Gifford.

Andrew Gifford, eldest son of Lady Busta's youngest daughter, who are heirs of conquest in general to the late Patrick Gifford, the adjudger, and Anderson has sent to Mr Malcolmson a brieve to expedite a general service in retour, which will be a good title to the adjudication, and of course to a heritable bond; and how soon the service is returned, a summons will be at their instance against Mowat of Garth, (Pur. 89). This service, which excluded Gideon from the character of heir-at-law, was accordingly obtained in 1777 (Pur. 95.); and the Gifford of Wethersta, to which the heirs were thus declared heirs-at-law, was a brother of old Busta, and he had probably been cognisant of the circumstances respecting the conveyance.

Lady Busta's belief in the legitimacy of her grandson and pupil cannot be reconciled with these proceedings. But her conduct can easily be reconciled to that of a managing grandmother, conscious of a fatal defect, and therefore desirous of submitting to almost any thing rather than provoke discussion.

Old Busta has recorded his opinion under his own hand. In the year 1752, at which time he must have recovered from the shock of the accident, and been in possession of the certificate, if it existed, which indeed is said to have been in the possession of his own wife, he set about arranging his affairs. For this purpose he has written a short narrative of the present situation of my family (Pur. p. 63.) In this narrative he explicitly sets forth the bastardy. 'It hath pleased God to call all my sons by death unmarried, and leaving no children after them, save my eldest son, who left a girl with child, whether he designed to marry her, I know not; but the child promises to be a very promising boy,' &c. mentioning his daughters and his estate, he says, 'As I have no son to succeed to, these daughters has the best natural right; but thereby my name and family becomes extinct, in case it is not otherwise provided by me in my lifetime, we have possessed the same upwards of 200 years.' To remedy this, he has devised 'to entail the whole, or the greater part thereof, upon my nearest heir-at-law, and although the child above-mentioned labours under a legal inability to inherit me and my estate, yet as that defect may be supplied, I think that he has the best natural right to stand first in the entail; and the necessary steps to be taken to clothe him with a legal title, I want to be informed anent.'

The information he got does not appear. But before the end of the year he had made an entail, conveying the estate of Busta to Gideon Gifford, 'my eldest son, procreate of the body of John Gifford, my eldest lawful son,' and conferring a destination in which a very impressive difference is made between this son and the lawful daughters. The estate is made to descend to Gideon, or to each of the daughters, and the heirs-male of the body of each successively. It is his provisions for the adopted grandson stops; for failing these heirs-male he brings in, not the heirs-female of his body, as is natural in the case of a son, but the heirs-female of the bodies of his daughters, and the heirs-male of their bodies. So that Gideon, with the best right if he was proved to be lawful, is thrown out of the succession sooner than his aunts, whose legitimacy was certain. It is under this entail that the estate has ever since been has been urged by the defender, that nothing can demonstrate the belief, of old Busta and his wife, in the legitimacy of Gideon, so unanswerably as the plain fact that they recognised him as their grandson. If, it is said, they knew him to be a bastard, and his mother, in asserting marriage, to have been guilty of perjury, shocking their affections, and insulting the memory of their son, is it possible that they could permit her to remain, and the child to be born and brought up in their house, and then settle the family estate upon him, to the exclusion of their daughters, one of whom, married to a Gifford, had at this

31. incompetent, inadmissible, and insufficient to instruct the defender's claim, and moreover, that the claim was disproved by the evidence led on the part of the pursuer.

"It is impossible not to feel the force of this view. Had the grand-parents not contradicted it, it would have been very strong. But looking at their whole conduct, it is difficult to comprehend their true feeling any how. It is certainly odd that they should disinherit their daughters for a bastard infant. But is it not as odd, that if they did not think him a bastard, they should transact serious business on the footing that he was one, and expressly call him so in solemn deeds? Their two lines of conduct cannot be perfectly reconciled, except on the supposition, which all the facts recommend as the probable solution, that they were perfectly aware of the illegitimacy, but cherished a genuine affection, which strengthened into a second nature for the adopted boy. The sudden loss of their own sons must have made them cling to the hope of any remnant being saved, and this hope was excited by the claim preferred at the moment by Barbara Pitcairn. The child was allowed to be born in the house, and it grew up under their eye. The grandmother recognised in him the features of her son, and the grandfather, at the very moment that he is stating him to be illegitimate, pleases himself by describing him as a promising boy. Is it quite out of nature that, in a remote part of feudal Scotland, in the year 1748, the passion for direct male descent, when united, in a landed family, with such an interest in the undoubted issue of an eldest son, should weaken the aversion to illegitimacy, and lead, especially if one-half the public disbelieved the law, to the preference of such issue over daughters and their children?

"If this solution cannot be received, and, if instead of reconciling both sides of their conduct, all that can be done is to adopt that one which is least incomprehensible, it has then to be observed that, in detecting the real feeling, more weight is due, in the case of parents, to behaviour indicating bastardy, than to that which indicates legitimacy. A parent may have many reasons for representing a natural son as legitimate. There are very few that can induce him to describe a legitimate child as a bastard.

"Lady Symbister's conduct, chiefly in relation to the certificate, has been already mentioned. I recur to it again, merely to notice that there is a letter by her to Gideon in 1778, in which she concludes thus:—'I am with esteem, dear sir, your affectionate aunt and humble servt' (Def. 61, D.) She was his aunt in one sense; in the same sense in which her father, in the same page in which he describes him as a natural child, calls him 'my grandson.' Whether this was the sense in which she used the word, may be judged of from what is stated by Principal Jack, one of her ladyship's lawful nephews. He swears (Pur. 32, E.), 'That though he believes his aunt acknowledged Gideon Gifford as the adopted heir of the family, she adopted the idea of her mother, and did not acknowledge him as her lawful nephew.' He adds, 'that she was a lady of such kindness and courtesy, that if she had believed him to be so, she would have acknowledged him in that character with the greatest warmth, which she did not' (Pur. 32, D.)

"The opinion of Gideon, in favour of the purity of his own birth, would perhaps be of little importance, were it not that his son, the defender, founds strongly on the long period during which he and his predecessors have been allowed to remain in unchallenged possession of the estate, and with a character of legitimacy never disputed. This plea makes it necessary to observe the facts.

"I disregard the drunken rudeness of Dr Gifford, who is said, when intoxicated, to have called Gideon a bastard to his face (Pur. 5, C.; 17, F.; 27, C.; 53, B.), and all such casual impertinencies. But it is impossible to overlook, that though there were always two known and inconsistent opinions about his birth, and that though the quashing of the injurious one by some decisive proceedings, while the evidence was fresh, would have been the natural course with a person confident of his legitimacy, he never attempted to establish his status as heir of line—he was contented to hold the estate merely under the entail. He was deseri

He got the estate of Busta under the deed, said, took some other subjects which that deed did not carry. These, or, words, the whole succession of Old Busta, came into his possession; and as he has been in the enjoyment of any thing not covered by the deed, nder argues that he must have been possessing under an admission of his e heir. I attach no weight to this negative recognition, especially as the says that it was supposed that these subjects fell under the deed, and e this has been found to be an error, the title to them is now under judi- ussion. But whatever doubt there may have been to the direct succes- Old Busta, there is none as to all the collateral successions. He allow- s to come in before him, on the open, formal, statement, set forth in proceedings, that they were the heirs, and not he. The evidence of this found in the details of the successions to Lady Symbister, to the Weth- d to the Girlsta bonds. The slenderness or utter fruitlessness of any successions is of no consequence. The character to him was every pursuer founded strongly on the correspondence which passed between r, and Gideon and his son, from 1808 to 1810, as evincing conscious Gideon, in the fabrication of the certificate. I think this imputation s. There are a few passages which are mysterious, because they cannot explained. But the allusions are all made intelligible enough, by suppos- they referred to Gideon's very natural desire to keep so false and danger- racter as Ollaberry from making charges, which, however groundless, troublesome. The letters, on the whole, are favourable to the predeces- e defender, who, I am confident, could have prevented the solemn decla- he had chosen to bribe its author. Nor do I think, that any force is the charge of accession to the forgery, by the scene described by Mr John (Pur. 42.), who says, that on hearing of the declaration, Gideon sent him larry how he could reconcile it with his letters—that Ollaberry's answer been written at Gideon's instigation, and that when this mes- id, Mrs Gideon Gifford burst into tears, and said they were d that if they had done any wrong, she hoped they would ask pardon of Almighty God.' (Par. 42, G.) Gideon sending such a message to such a man, is scarcely reconcilable with conscious guilt. The double crime, of causing both the certificate and the letters to be forged, rests on Ollaberry, an undoubted culprit, alone, and is inconsistent even with his declaration, where he states himself to have been induced to write only a single false letter, whereas his answer to the message makes the charge include them all. The exclamation of Mrs Gifford evinces alarm by her at a communication about a matter she was ignorant of, but no admission or consciousness of criminality by her husband, or by any body.

"The long apparent acquiescence by Ollaberry in what his son now describes as the usurpation of status by his adversary, might be as strong a fact for the defender as the silence of Gideon is for the pursuer, if it were possible to make any thing sincere or consistent out of Ollaberry's conduct. But he plainly had a principle or object but extortion; for which he professed and varied according to circumstances, so as to make it absurd to refer his proceedings to any honest conviction either of legitimacy or of bastardy. The only clear truth seems to have been that he and Gideon were mutually afraid.

"On the whole, a review of what the immediate connexions of the family actually did, impresses me with the conviction that, in so far as they profess to believe in the marriage, their professions were inconsistent with their conduct; and wherever this repugnance occurs, a court can be at no loss which to prefer.

"In judging of the whole case, we are apt to be misled by the mere antiquity of the events. Their remoteness, though by no means so great as to lie beyond the reach of ordinary evidence, tempts us to overlook its rules, and has a tendency to give a story, in itself simple, an air of mystery, and to substitute a cloud of rumour, fancy, hearsay, and tradition, for original and proved facts. The proper mode of dealing with such a question is to divest it of all this confusing matter and to consider it as an ordinary recent case, depending on the evidence now before us. Depriving it of its antiquity gives, in my opinion, great advantage to the defender, because it excludes that long course of divided reputation, and of unfavourable proceedings which afterwards followed. What would there have been to have maintained an action of declarator of legitimacy of marriage in the year 1750 on the present evidence? There had been no previous enunciation, or warranted belief, that such an union was to take place. Concealment was a part of the scheme. After the union was formed, and during the five months it subsisted, this necessity kept down all external indications of what had passed. There was no congratulations by friends, no introductions to new relations, no acknowledgments by society, no open conjugal recognitions by the parties themselves. While matters are in this state, the averred marriage is suddenly dissolved by an accident, which carries off the husband and all the known witnesses of the ceremony. The certificate (assuming its genuineness) alone remains, but uncorroborated by any other writing or by any testimony. If evidence of a marriage cannot be extracted out of these elements, it could still less be extracted out of the events of the subsequent seventy years. Had the union been gone about in the usual way, the calamity which dissolved it would not have extinguished its proof. But the rules, or the application of the rules, of evidence, cannot be altered to suit the convenience of those who, by irregular and concealed proceedings, unfortunately deprive themselves of their protection.

"Certain legal maxims have been referred to, which it is scarcely necessary to notice. Such as that, in dubio pro statu presumendum, and that filiation being proved, legitimacy is to be presumed. These principles have no application to a case where the parents never were in possession of the status of married persons during the subsistence of the alleged marriage, and where the repute of the child was always very equivocal.

it appears to me there can be no doubt that whatever were the powers and duties of this Court before the statute of 1st and 2d George IV. c. 38, abolishing the court of macers, and authorizing advocations of brieves of service to be discussed before the junior Lord Ordinary, no alteration in regard to these was introduced; the review of the proceedings of juries on brieves of mort-ancestry having in no respect been provided for of new, but left upon the footing on which it formerly stood. In regard to what those powers and duties are, I do not consider it material to advert particularly to the early state of our law as to the falsing of dooms, or prosecution for wilful error of assize. The frequency of iniquitous verdicts on brieves of service had led to the various statutory regulations contained in the acts 1471, c. 47, and 1494, c. 57; but their object was not only the setting aside of iniquitous verdicts, but the punishment of the assizers themselves. It is in explaining the law upon this matter that Lord Stair (III. 5, 43) thus expresses himself:—"It must be an evident and gross error in the positive probation, specially concerning the death of the defunct, and his being once infest; the special relation and degree of blood of the heir, his age, and the extent of the fee, which, though the point of least moment, yet will annul the retour. But if there be a probable cause for the inquest, as by production of writs containing wrong extents, they will be declared free of wilful error. The manner of reducing of retours is by a summons of error against the assizers before the King's Council, which is now the Lords of Council and Session." In the next paragraph it is added,—"Though it be the ordinary way to annul retours by a great inquest, yet the Lords do sometimes sustain reductions thereof as erroneous by witnesses before themselves without a great inquest." It is quite clear, therefore, that while Lord Stair is here explaining the older law, he adverts to the practice which had recently been introduced of the Court of Session having come to proceed by reduction before themselves, without any grand inquest, or of course any process for punishing on the ground of wilful error. Though the exercise of such a power of review and reduction may appear at first sight somewhat anomalous, yet the invariable custom of taking down in writing every part of the proceedings, and the whole of the evidence which is laid before the inquest, who in so far act also as judges, renders the duty more conformable to what is exercised by the Court in reviewing the proceedings of all in-

Gifford v.

"Even if this had been a motion, therefore, for a new trial, on the ground that the verdict was contradicted or unsupported by the evidence, I should have felt compelled to grant it. But this is not the principle on which the validity of a verdict of service is to be determined. The law as it is, does not trust the decision of such questions of status solely, or even principally, to juries; and where the conclusion come to by them is challenged, it not only gives a review to the Court, but requires the Court to confirm the verdict, only when the judges are themselves satisfied that the evidence can warrant no other result. Hence the proof is directed to be taken down in writing, merely in order to enable them to have the means of correcting the jury by their own independent opinion; and the processes, both of trial and of revision, are, in other material respects, conducted on quite different principles from those of an ordinary case. Still there must always be a disposition to respect what any previous tribunal has done, especially what has been done by a jury with facts. But, with all this, I cannot uphold a verdict which, I think, most clearly repugnant to the evidence and to the facts of the case. The effect of additional evidence, if tendered, remains to be

31. ferior judicatories; while it must have been contemplated that many difficult legal 1357. points were likely to arise in intricate questions of propinquity. But whatever may have led to it, the fact is undoubted that, since the period referred to by Lord Stair, this Court has discharged the duty of deciding in reductions of services and retours, not only in cases where they have been obtained ex parte, or where there have only been contradictors, but also in competitions where the rights of parties have been fully contested. These cases have been judged of and determined sometimes only on a review of the same evidence which was before the inquest, at other times after allowing one or both of the parties to adduce additional evidence, and again in other cases by allowing or ordering additional witnesses to be examined at the latest stages of the cause in presence of the Court itself for the furtherance of justice. It may be said that this shows that in this department of the law we are called to exercise unusual functions by, in fact, mixing up judicial acts with what had previously been the peculiar duties of a jury; and all this I admit to be true.
 But still we must take the state of the law as we find it, and when we keep in view what has been our own practice, as well as that of our predecessors under it, in the various cases which are familiar to all of us, and need not be particularly adverted to, I cannot for one moment listen to the idea that we are now to apply to cases of this description the principles or rules applicable to ordinary jury trials as to civil rights, and which have lately been introduced by statute. It is quite impossible, therefore, seeing that the legislature has in no respect interfered with the review of verdicts in services of heirs that we can resort in this case to the rules as to the applications for new trials or objections to the verdict in ordinary civil cases. And I can by no means assent to the argument, that because in the late special case of Watson the House of Lords did think fit to direct issues as to propinquity to be tried by a jury, that decision either did or was intended to alter the law as to our duty in regard to the reduction of services in general. In that case, each party in a competition for the succession of a Mr Watson had obtained a service ex parte, and mutual reductions were brought; and while one of them was sisted, additional proof was allowed by the Lord Ordinary to support the pedigree in the other. That evidence was held sufficient by the First Division, and the reasons of reduction repelled, which would have given the succession to the party supposed to be related to the deceased in the nearest degree. This judgment having been appealed, the House of Lords ordered mutual issues as to the alleged propinquities to be tried by jury. In the present case we must steer our course according to the lights of former times, and cannot resort to the new views which have reference to the system of jury trial recently introduced. I consider, therefore, that we must dispose of this case as other similar cases have been dealt with; and that we, as the Lord Ordinary in the first instance had to do, have now to decide, whether the evidence, upon which the verdict serving the defender was returned, was such as to sustain that verdict, or whether the pursuer of this reduction did not adduce evidence which warranted him to be served as the nearest lawful heir in general of Thomas Gifford. A good deal of discussion has taken place as to the party on whom the onus probandi properly lies; but which appears to be of very little importance to the right determination of the case. For unquestionably in this as in every reduction, the pursuer must necessarily show by sufficient evidence that the conclusions of his action are well-founded, and, accordingly, we have now to decide whether the pursuer of this reduction of the service obtain-defender has established by sufficient evidence that that service was not by the evidence led before the jury, but, on the contrary, that the jury it to have served the pursuer nearest lawful heir of line of the common

A debate having taken place on these defences, and the pursuers having moved that, before condescending, the defenders should be pointed to lodge a state of the accounts referred to in the ninth defence, the Lord Ordinary found it unnecessary hoc statu to dispose of the defence, refused hoc statu the motion of the pursuers, and appointed condescendence and answers.

The defenders reclaimed, praying the Court to recall the interdict in so far, inter alia, as it found it unnecessary hoc statu to dispose of the sixth defence, and to sustain that defence, and dismiss the action.

The pursuers also reclaimed, and prayed the Court to repel the defence, and to ordain the defenders to lodge a state of the accounts referred to in the ninth defence.

THE COURT refused both notes.
